Published Semi-Monthly.

[12 Pages.]

[Complete.

BEADLE'S

The Choicest Works of the Most Popular Authors:

THE EMERALD NECKLACE;

OR,

MRS. BUTTERBY'S BOARDER.

BY ROSE KENNEDY.

New-Nork:

BEADLE AND COMPANY, 141 WILLIAM ST.

Ross & Tousey, General Agents

by Beadle and Company, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New-York.

ANOTHER EXCITING BORDER ROMANCE!

AUTHOR OF "SETH JONES" AND "BILL BIDDON" AGAIN IN THE FIELD!

To Issue Tuesday, Jannary Fifteenth.

The Frontier Angel:

A ROMANCE OF

KENTUCKY RANGER'S LIFE.

BY EDWARD S. ELLIS.

The extraordinary success of the two previous productions from this gentleman's pen, viz.:—"SETH JONES; or, the Captives of the Frontier," and "BILL BIDDON, TRAPPER; or, Life in the Northwest," has not failed to direct the public attention strongly toward the author. Since Cooper's incomparable "Pathfinder," "Greyslayer," &c., &c., nothing has been given to the literature of this country of more living, exciting interest than the romances above named.

The novel now commenced is of the same nature as its predecessors, dealing as it does, with frontier life and border adventures. The locale is in Northern Kentucky and Southern Ohio and Indiana, and the personages introduced embrace several well-known historical characters. The story is exciting to the most intense degree, and the exquisite delineations of woman's sufferings and devotion add to its pages a charm quite irresistible in its beauty and pathos.

Do not fail to procure it, every lover of pure, historical romance !

BEADLE AND COMPANY, Publishers, 141 William Street, New York.

1 Shirth By Mus Vieles

APPARITION. THE

EMERALD NECKLACE;

OR,

MRS. BUTTERBY'S BOARDER.

BY ROSE KENNEDY.

EADLE AND COMPANY PUBLIS

BEADLE AND COMPANY, PUBLISHERS, 141 WILLIAM ST., CORNER OF FULTON.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by

BEADLE AND COMPANY,

in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

THE EMERALD NECKLACE;

OR,

MRS. BUTTERBY'S BOARDER.

CHAPTER I.

MRS. BUTTERBY'S BOARDER.

"And a little house,—no more
In state than suits two quiet lovers;
And a woodbine round the door,
Where the swallow builds and hovers.

"With a silver sickle-moon
O'er hot gardens, red with roses;
And a window wide, in June,
For serenades, when evening closes.

"Canvas, brushes, hues to catch Fleeting forms in vale or mountain;
And an evening star to watch
When all's still save one sweet fountain."

Owen Merepite.

A young man, with an artist's kit swung lightly over his shoulder, went slowly along a valley road, admiring the afternoon of summer gilding the hill-tops, and wondering where he should sleep that night, if he kept wandering on, at this rate, farther and farther from the country village whose one hotel held watch and ward over his trunk and box of painting materials.

"I will rest at some farm-house to-night," he said, or thought, and get up early for a sunrise view."

Lingering along the rustic, seldom traveled road, he came soon to just such a spot as he would have coveted in which to spend a night in the valley. A stone house, a story and a half in height, with a steep roof running down over a porch at one side, stood in a little wilderness of shrubs and trees. A large yard in front had numberless rose-bushes in profusest bloom, and two round beds of verbenas lying in the bright grass. At the side of the house, opposite the porch, an orchard stretched away to wheat fields ripening between that and the hills. The size of the sturdy apple-trees, as well as the moss upon the roof of the dwelling, and the sedate and tranquil air of all around, proclaimed the antiquity of the place. Pennon stood a moment to admire the scene, with his hand upon the latch of the gate. Around by the porch the grass was worn with the trampling of feet, and an old-fashioned well-sweep, with an "old oaken bucket" attached, and smooth stones about the well-curb, looked not the least antique and peaceful of the accessories. The thirsty traveler longed to drink from the bucket's brim, especially when he saw a young girl trip lightly forth, and swing it down into the cool depths of the well. He could not see her face, and she did not observe him. Quickly and gracefully she drew the bucket up, peering down as if at her own features mirrored in its waves. Suddenly, while he paused by the gate, she uttered a low scream, the pole remained stationary in her hands, and she seemed transfixed by some unaccountable sight of terror.

Pennon flung open the gate, and hurried through the yard to her side. Just as he reached her she burst into a light, silvery laugh. She was holding up against the warm light of the descending sun a string of the richest emeralds, which glowed and sparkled as they hung tremulous from her hand.

"I thought it was a green serpent when I first saw it," she said, apologetically, to the stranger, whom she at that instant perceived, "and I am so afraid of them. I shouldn't have screamed, if it had not have taken me so by surprise."

"You have fished up good fortune," he replied, gazing into her beautiful, earnest face. "That string of emeralds must be very costly. How did they come in the well?"

"I am sure I can not tell," answered the girl.

"It is quite wonderful," he said, scanning them closely.

She remarked his artist's kit, and the air which he had of being a traveler.

"Did you wish to see my father?" she inquired.

"I have been wandering about the country, enjoying the lovely scenery, and have strayed far from the village where I have taken a room," he said. "I thought perhaps the dwellers in this charming place would not refuse me a night's lodging, that I may be able to sketch yonder hills in the mist and purple shadows of the morning."

"If you have walked all the way from Greenville to-day, you will indeed not feel like returning there this evening. My mother is in the house, and papa will soon be here; I presume they will be glad to welcome you. Walk in, sir."

She spoke with as much ease as simplicity. He was charmed with her manner and with her beauty. Both were peculiar, and not of the strictly fashionable mold, but refined, and, he thought, much more exquisite. They had the freshness and sweetness of nature, as if all the quiet and yet glorious loveliness of the scenery about her had made their impression upon mind and expression. She stooped to lift the bucket to its place; and as she did so her dark brown hair swept in heavy curls down her vermil cheeks, and floated upon the breeze. Pennon thought of Rachel, and wished mentally that he was Jacob. Then he blushed slightly to think that he had already dreamed of kissing that innocent mouth, and reproved himself for his guilt.

"Jacob was sent by his father to claim Rachel, and, being a relative, he had a right to kiss her, I suppose. But this maiden's lips I will not profane by a thought."

"Clematis!" called some one from the house.

"My mother is waiting for the water."

He took the bucket from her hand, emptied its contents into the tin pail she had brought, and carried it for her into the house. There he met a fine-looking woman, still fresh and fair, not quite as delicate as her daughter, but with the dignity and cordiality of an old-fashioned lady. He made his apologies for intruding so handsomely, and his looks seconded his words so well, that she was not displeased to extend her hospitalities to him, though that she would have done to the humblest, for the stone house had sheltered many a forlorn one for more than one night.

And here we will vouch for the truth of his statements by giving the reader a glimpse at our hero, as he sat in his city boarding-house, only four days previous to this, thinking how poor was Mrs. Butterby's best, for which he paid ten dollars a week, compared with "country cream," carpets of grass and flowers, fresh boiled chickens, new-laid eggs, glorious sunsets, dew, distant views, rustic mowers cutting grass, butter out of the spring-house, etc., according to the fancies of city people with which they adorn in their summer dreams that otherwise dreary waste, the country.

"To-morrow will be the first day of June," he said, to himself. "It is time to be thinking of a retreat for the summer. This room has served me well for the past six months, but it is not so pleasing in its aspect under the rays of this glaring sun."

He looked around dissatisfied upon the medley of things which made of his one apartment—parlor, dressing-room, library, and atelier; yet there was a mingling of affection with his discontent, for he had too warm a heart to bid adieu without regret to a place where he had spent so many hours both of pleasure and weariness. Any four walls within whose protection he had slept sweet sleeps, dreamed fair dreams, which he had peopled with the creations of his pen and pencil, and where he had felt safe from storm and cold-any four walls within which he had lived (and Pennon knew the full meaning of the verb to live), had a claim upon his regard. With a kindly glance he surveyed those things to which he was about to bid farewell; while the sun, throwing the full force of his beams in at the windows, made the light and heat intolerable. Not a breath of cool air could he woo down from amid the fierce brick battlements which arose upon his outer view, driving him back to the contemplation of his books covered with dust, of the Psyches and Madonnas, Roses and Hebes of his canvas blushing in the broad day, of the soiled bed-cover, and of the worn-out slippers and faded carpet. The paints upon his pallet smelled disagreeably; nothing seemed so senseless as the lines he had written an hour before for the - Magazine, and which now lay in torn bits upon the floor. All things had on that common-place expression which is so distasteful, causing Pennon to say to himself decidedly:

"To-morrow I will go away from here."

Leaning back in his arm-chair, he wandered away in thought to all the retreats he had either seen or heard of—Newport, Greenland, Saratoga, Rome, the Source of the Nile, the Mountain House, Brighton, the North Pole, the Cape, the Sault Ste. Marie. Many other fashionable and unfashionable places he visual in his reverle, as it was not until after the sun had set, and he had reposed in his arm-chair an hour and a half that he chose from such a variety an abode to his liking.

It would secreely be proper to say that Pennon choosen an abode, for in fact he had only resolved to go journeying in a certain way, and allow his stopping-place to be a matter of chance, to be decided by likings or events. Like many others of a turn of mind like his, and especially accompanied by the teste for sketching, he thought of making a rambling expedition, partly on foot, down into a beautiful part of his native State, making some drawings for future paintings, and amusing himself with any adventures which might befolk Plenning out some of the particulars of such an excursion, be relepsed into a deep reverie, from which he was aroused by a tap at the door, when the landlady thrust her good-natured face into the room, begging the young gentleman to come to tea.

"The bell less rung and rung," said she; "the other boarders has all supped and gine away. I should a thought you was not in, if it was not so often that I have known you not to hear the lill. I suppose you have been thinking up another of these beautiful stories which I hear people tellin' of—though, liw sales! I don't get any time to read, for efforts to make my boarders comfortable."

Thus she rattle I on as they descent I the stairs to ether, for Pennon was her fivorite, and the only one whom she would not have got out of temper with for keeping her table waiting.

"Yes, Mrs. Butterby," returned her guest, "I have been thinking up an excellent story this time. It will take all summer to complete, but I will come back and tell it to you next November."

"Come back! You don't me in to say you have intentions of Laving us, sir?" and the lauth did out of the dimples in the lauthaly's rosy face, as she sat like it is at the board to pour out the tea.

I am going into the country to an rrow, but you will see me again in the fall, Providence permitting."

"Dear, dear! It'll be lonesome without your hight face at the table. Howsomever, people will take notions that they must go to the country in the summer. I never thought the country was much of a place—but every one to their tasts. Don't forget where we live when you come back, Mr. Penn. n."

He promised her he that he certainly would not inget.

His tea was very sweet—he liked it so; and he e ull a thelp feeling a little flattered and grateful for the prefactor of the good woman who dispensed to him, he was aware, a loger quantity of the sweets of life than she did to any other of her boarders. Her partiality for him was not owing to the it that he always paid his bill promptly when it was present hout to that genial kindness in his voice and smile which wen the hearts of all, both high and low.

When he had finished his second cup, which for his bill, settled it, and passed a few parting words of politeness with Mrs. Butterby, he returned to his room, and spont the evening writing letters, packing a trunk with books, chethes, and so on; and also in arranging an artist's portfolio and campest of combined—an invention which he had hims if gotten up to suit his convenience.

He went to be light weary enough to have delightful drains, which he took as good omens of the prosperity of his summer tour, woke up in the merning eager and joyons, impating the his adventures. For, although Pennon was twenty six, he had almost the impetuosity and freshness of fedling of a child. The world was not "weary, stale, that, and unit ideal in the him; he liked it—that is, pretty generally, the pile of course there were times when he was very miserally, as there may be with all impassioned natures and sungained timp raise his this particular morning he was as blittle as Shelley's skylick, and trilled several little melodies while making his toll to recast as sweet as those of that immortal hird, but quite it have harmonious enough for a mere man without wires to some "into heaven, or near it."

He went off in the early six o'clock train for the north, and breakfasted at a railroad station, swallowing the limit of with an inward regret that it was not of his had help's make. Being safely started upon his journey, it matters not have or where the first three days were possible that it was little elected.

of that third day he was wan lering, camp-stool in hand, through one of the loveliest valleys ever seen, looking up at the near hills and the sunset clouds, and blessing the feeling of the cool soft grass beneath his feet.

Thus it was that Paul Pennon, artist, chanced to interweave his own web of life with some links of the curious and costly emeral I necklace which this unknown young girl had just brought from its hiding-place.

"Look, mother!" said Clematis, as soon as the stranger had been welcomed; "see what I drew up from the well! This gentleman says they are real emeralds."

With her first glance at the treasure the mother grew very pale, and waved her hand as if to move it away.

"You do not know what you have done, my child," she will. "Ill fortune waits upon the one who should first find the emerald necklace."

"Why, mamma, what do you mean? I never heard any thin; about any necklace. Did you know that it was in the well? Does it belong to the family?"

"No matter, now, my darling. You have found it, and I fear that the fulfillment of the prophecy must fall upon you, which Heaven avert! It was your grandmother's."

Clematis Percy was not superstitious; she would walk through a graveyard alone at night; but something in her mother's voice startled her, and she looked at the glittering bubble with considerable awe. It radiated light like the eyes of a living thing.

"Shall I throw it back in the well?" she asked.

"I suppose it would not alter the flite of your finding it, if you did," said the elder lady, sadly.

"Oh, well; then I'll keep it-it will be so charming to wear around my throat," said Clematis, gayly.

The thought of jewels, real jewels, had dispelled her awe; so she carried away the prize and returned to tea, all cariosity to hear its history, which her mother refused at present to tell.

CHAPTER II.

THE HISTORY OF THE NECKLACE.

Handed from ages down—a nurse's tale—
Which children, open-cy-dand mouthid, devour."

"Our witches are no longer old
And wrinkled beldams, Satan-sold;
But young and gay and languing creatures."
With the heart's sunshing on their features."

WHITTIER.

The room which Pennon occupied that night was a quaintlooking apartment, and a most agreeable change from the square, dusty, common-place chamber at Mrs. Batterby's. was scarcely high enough at two of the siles for him to stand under, but was quite lofty in the center of the pointed ceiling. It was large and dim, with painted walls. Nearly in the center stood the bed, broad and high, covered with a silken comterpane whose embroidered flowers were dim and somewhat fraved with wear, and the bed was shad d quite gran lly with lace curtains. The whole farniture, including two or three pictures upon the walls, looked as if it might have been arranged a hundred years before. Nothing lack linew execut the absence of dust, the scrupulous whit nessef the linen, and a bouquet of fresh flowers in a very up n a stant. A large Gothic window, corresponding in archite ture with the point 1 roof, occupied a portion of one side of the ram. After laking about with great curiosity, the gue textingui helbis light and sat himself by the window to enjoy the effect of the menlight both within and without.

Immediately beneath, a flower garden sent up a hat of mingled perfames to feast his senses, and all about the custment was twined honeysuckles and roses, clinging to the cold stone with slender tendrils like fingers, and bending over to peep beneath or swing at ease on their airy perches. A stream girdled the valley with a belt of silver; he could hear its drowsy plash where it descended a little flowery slope.

Pennon was in one of his poetical moods. Whether the sweet face he had seen leaning over the well, bathed in the rosy light of sunset, or the peculiar beauty of the place and hour had most to do in inducing it, can not be said—probably both had their share in leading him on to dangerous dreams of fancy and sentiment.

"This will never do," he murmured, as a clock in the room beneath struck eleven. "If I rise at four in the morning to make my sketch, I must be to bed betimes."

He had been scribbling what may have been rhymes upon a scrap of paper, by the suggestive light of the moon, for the last half hour. This he thrust into his pocket, and resigned his scat by the window for repose upon the inviting, quaint-looking bed.

Just as he was sinking from conscious thought into slumber, the sound of the clock, striking the midnight hour, fell faintly upon his ear. At the same moment he became aware, as by some mystic influence, of the presence of some one in the chamber. He was wide awake in an instant; and turning his head he saw what, if his conscience had not been clear and his soul composed, would have frightened him.

An old lady stood near his bed. He could not see her face distinctly, but it looked very pale, though not severe. Her hair was puffed and powdered in the ancient style. A broad bar of moonlight lay across her dress, and he could plainly see that it was of rich brocade, cut goreing, and plaited into a helt upon which shone a handsome gold buckle in which he detected the glitter of jewels. As he gazed at her she spoke. Her voice was hollow, but not unmusical. It had a mournful calence as of a voice burdened with too great a knowledge of sorrow.

"Unhappy man! who art thou that thou shouldst come here to trouble the innocent? Was it destiny that led thee to the well at that fatal moment, to blight the fortunes of the fairest of the Percys? Be merciful, and go from here before destiny has its consummation. But that can not be; fate is immutable—immutable—immutable!"

Her voice arose, not loud but shrill, like the shricking of a summer wind, and before its accents closed she glided chently away, save a soft rustle of the silk brocade.

"Well," said Pennon, in a subde d while, after a phort silence, "this is really like an old romance. One middle with most be persuaded that some witchery was contained with those green stones which that well gave up to-day. Immediable! Can it be that I am in any way immediably contained with the fate of that lovely creature?"

His cheek glowed at the thought, until he remembered that the prediction was of her sorrow. That was not so pleasant.

"Pshaw! of course I was dreaming," he ejected that a time, and being very sleepy, he dropped again into his slambers.

He awoke at four o'clock, and the first thing which he recalled was his vision of the night before. It seems I make real in memory even than in experience. If he had not had a contempt for the idea of ghosts, he would containly have helieved in the apparition. The more he thought of it the marit puzzled him; so he dismissed it as much as pas The man his mind.

"To get up or not to get up thus early in the norming, is the question," he softly yawned.

Four hours of skep had hardly rest-1 him, and he was about to give up the idea of a sketch, when he can he a glimpse of the hills through the window, and they were such a magic atmosphere, and the sky beyond was tinged so exquisitely, that the artist awoke in his soul. He forg this reluctance, and sprang from his couch in a glow of entired so.

In fifteen minutes he was on his way to a part of the valley from which he wished to begin his work. He came had to breakfast none too soon; the tunity were at the table when he entered. They gave him a counteons greather; that a Comatis was very slight in words, but a rapid heightening of color in her check spoke of interest or timility.

His drawing, which was done in water-colors, was lain at by all and very much admired.

"If we only had so good a picture of our dear tative valley, how much I should like it," said Clematis, and then blushed for fear the stranger would think she was asking him in that way to give it to her. Penn nie led top qui kly to Faran v Pery.

"An oil-painting will be more darable," said he, "and if you do not feel that I shall introductor a day or two, I will copy this in oil for your daughter. It will be but a small return for the privilege of stopping in this beautiful place."

Chanatis turned her bright eyes up a her father with a look which asked him to accept the offer.

This he was glad to do; and before the meal was completed, arrangements were concluded on. The firmer was going to the village that morning for men to help him cut the grass in his meadows, and he would stop at the hotel and get the bex containing convas, etc., at the same time that he informed the landlord of the whereabours of his guest, and bade him take care of his other bargage until called for.

That afternoon an impromptu easel was set up in the resestationed and rose-scented parlor of the old farm-house. What pen could hope to picture the charm of those swid-footed hours stading by, while Pennon painted, talking at the same time in his in tructive, fanciful, and original manner to mother and daughter, as they set, with their sawing, listening and answering more by smill sand interested looks than by word? Smetim's Clematic sung, at his request, and then he plint I with more won brill swiftness and off at them ever,—his brushess on all to fly of thems lives, his colors to take on rare tints, until the picture glowed in an othered softness of atm splace in rolls with distances of atm splace in rolls with distances of atm.

Ah! the study farmer did not suess, much as he was delighted with the serve, that giving him that picture for a fow days hourd and helphor, was like giving him a costly poul or diamond in return for a toy basket:

It was on the fourth afternoon of his stay, that at his solist at in, equal with her daughter's, Mrs. Percy gave the firmily her rals converted with the string of emerchls which Clematis had found in the well.

As n wind was blowing among the rees, and distant glings of the landscape he was weaking upon could be had from the com windows. The very wit hery of present remands some I howering about the young couple, while the still had been neither to drup the remands of the past.

" You much heart," began the mation, with a book of paids not at all unbecoming to her, "that the Percys are an ancient family, and that Clematis has good blood in her voins."

"I do not doubt it," thought the artist, with a glunce of the peach-like cheeks, so fresh and velvety, where the right veins glowed with the very healthiest and best of block.

"But it is not on her father's side alone that she is thus gifted; my own family was the peer of the Percys, in the good old days of Que n Bes, but re this country was any more than a strange and unfamiliar dram. This is Mariner came into the family in 1595. It was present they Mertiner Monteith to my beautiful ancestress, Ludy Alice de Vert, on the day of her wedding to John, Earl of Lester.

Mortimer Monteith was a Scotch cousin of the Laly Alice's, who had once been a sultor for her Land, but who had been rejected. He was not a man to inspire the other six with tender sentiment, says the tradition; and he took his horizontal in that silent sort of way which no one knows have to interpret. However, he was present at the welling-first, and gave the lovely bride this costly gift, claspin it along her white throat with his own hands.

That night, when the bridegroom sou let the clauser of his bride, he found her dead in her bed; nor call all the science of the best physicians of that day say what it was that killed her. The emerald neckhee which her mail as bed forgotten to unclusp, was about her throat, spurilling and finding like some beautiful serpent exulting in its pour toutestroy. At least, thus it appeared to some, while others wall not acknowledge that it could process any field inflance. Monteith was never heard from afterward; and the willow carl threw his life away in battle at the first oppositionly.

many years in its casket. Upon the marriage of the there beauty from the house of de Vere, it was sent, and in the rejewels, a present to the bride. Three weeks after the well-ding, she was instantly killed, by being thrown from her horse, while out hunting. Singularly enough, she was the emeralds at the time, having taken a facey that they subspline green velvet riling habit. A whilp rink with it through the family that some evil and fail inflored in the necklace. For a period of severity years not made all le inluerd to wear it; and no balle of the de Veres but would have shull be lat having it presented to her. It was hert in a custot by itelf, and booked at as a curiosity. Its -, lender and cestilia was no temptation to the vanity of the thir wenn'n who examin i it; until Madeline Monteith, a brillimit creature, full of spirit and bravery, being betrothed to a note outdier, arowel her intention of personal herself of the need we to all to the jewels of her to 'se't. It was a sich , sla sil, to let so superb an ornament langui h in per-; the bride who were it but would have been thrown from her horse, if sachalist che ntoweartheen ralls. As for herself, they terms her, they were negraticent, and she would wear them. Sir L. I har way about it; and for a time she seemed to ir pr; but she never but her chamber after the birth of a ; my low, and diel in les than a year from her brill day.

It would weary you," continued Mrs. Perry, "to recount the history of the various women of our line who have perimed from accident or not with sold in death, after having held the toperity to wear the emeral I necklade. It has been the tradiciously belt for the Mortimer Mont ith his love's a curse and has eyen his gift as compared with his been the surface with horse by mountain two his connected with it, it has everal threshold in way by some one or another of my uncertainty in the first way for the planer or hoter, to come to light, whather it were thread into yourning charms, into be ones of deep lake, into first, or, as in this late t instance, into a volcate will; and the first has ever been as unfortunate as the eto whom it has been presented.

It came, with a branch of the family, over the water about a limit of years as a. The vest in which they said was wrecked on Absorbance st; but all of the parenters were at except one year publ. Anneads Vere, a levely or attresting alle and hepe of all, who being dranged to shore in the madel specific faller, was found to be drown it, that hat full madel specific rings of the fallers was found to be drown it, that hat full madel specific rings of the fallers of the stormy dawn.

to the companies of the state of the second of the second was a woman of excellent min he sided at the stories attached to the costly trinket, which she thought would be a fine present to me upon the occasion of my marriage. She sent to an aunt, who had the jewels in charge (almost the sole remaining token of former splendor), who forwarded them at her request, and they arrived the day before my marriage. This house, in which we still reside, was the homestead of my mother. Well do I remember of taking that dreaded how (if r I combes to a small degree of superstition), steading out in the mountielt, and dropping it into the well,—after which I breathed not freely; and could give my hand to my lover, the next making, with no worse dread than mailens usually feel up a similar occasions. It was eighteen years ago the tanth of last month," she added, with a soft sigh.

"And to your throwing away the circulds, I supplies you attribute all of your and papers unwented felicity," said Clematis, with a light laugh.

"I do—I certainly do!" muranured Mrs. Percy; "and I am sorry you found them, Clematis. May He wen avert the usual result!"

The mother sail this so solemnly that the young girl filt oppressed for a moment. The dying light of the sun streaks? the twilight with rosy bars; the perfamal wind sight let the casement; a bird fluttered to its nest with a sail ken, transitors cry.

The artist had put the last touch to his picture as the haly spoke the last word of her stary. He had been listening while he painted,—now he laid aside his pullet, looked at Connais.

and sighed.

"Come!" laughed the, "this is growing in hareholy; let to

But there was not light enough left for this severe builds.
—she must defer her decision to the morrow.

To-morrow! To-morrow their guest was g in raw y.

CHAPTER III.

THE ACCIDENT.

"I know not if the sunshine waste,
The world is dark since thou art cone!
The hours are, oh! so leaden-paced!
The birds sing and the stars float on—
But sing not well and look not fair:
A weight is in the summer air.

WILLIS.

That same evening, after the lamps were brought in, Mr. Percy joined the company, asking his daughter for some music. Clematis could wile strange melodies out of the old-fishioned piano; every one loved to hear her play and sing. While she complied with her father's request, Pennon sat silently regarding her, and thinking how loth he should be to quit the stone cottage, now that his picture was fluished.

"If I could only invent another excuse," he sighed. "Not that any thing is to be gained by staying here, in particular—only the opportunity of enjoying this delightful country; and the house is so quiet and the people so pleasant—I wish they would take me as a boarder for a few weeks. A great many persons take summer boarders. I wonder if they would be displeased if I should make the proposition."

While he was musing upon the best way to broach the subject, Clematis, who had been playing some of her gayest, least soulful music, arose and moved to the lamp on the center-table.

"Mamme," she said, with a smiling face, "is it not curious, we have not only been favored by having an artist in our valley, but some poet has also been wandering about this vicinity. Papa found this paper out in the meadow, and brought it to me thinking it mine. It is quite like poetry—shall I read it to you?"

A sudden suspicion crossed Pennon's mind. He thrust his hand in his vest pocket with a look of dismay.

"Yes, to be sure, Clematis, read it."

"It begins, as usual, with a title," said the mischievous girl, with app read gravity, "and is called, "At the Well."

Here Pennon made a start to seize the paper, but was prevented, and the young lady continued:

AT THE WELL.

She stood beside the ancient well, A youthful girl, in rustic plight; The resy sunset round her tell. Flushing her form with lovely light.

No rustic was she, though she dipp'd
The back to the fourtain deep,
And laugh'd to see how silvery dripp'd
The water floar the ben ling sweep.

As the old legands love to sav— An angel stirr'd the ripples cool Within that well at these of day.

The sunset's glow was not more bright.
Than the rich masses of her hair,
Inst where they rounded to the ball.
In nestling on her shoulders fair.

Eyes laughing, and yet fall of pride, And father still of live and hope; And cheeks as delicately dyel. As flowers that in the moonlight ope.

The lip with its own swe these mute,
The dazzling arm, the graceful form
Light poised upon our slender foot—
All bathed in sunlight soft and warm!

As if to greet her own bright eyes
She bent above the mossy curb;
I long'd, yet fear'd, by some surprise
The beauteous vision to disturb.

Just then a wild and thrilling scream
Sent back the life-blood from my cheek;
Alasi haw vanished my sweet dream!
I hate a frighten'd woman's shriek.

"I did not write that hat verse—you added it y arrelf," cried Pennon, half-angry at the mocking tone of sentiment with which she read his unfortunate production, y t oblight to laugh at the mock-heroic conclusion she had tack her to the unfinished poem.

" You!" she exclaimed: "you are the author, then, are you?" and of course I am the heroine."

"Of course you are! and the most beautiful of all the hundreds I have had, and the most willing to read and predicting your own praises."

There was a tritle of malice in the lest half of his sentence, which was prevoked by an intuitive feeling that if Clematis Lader langthing about his verses or his commendations, at least if she half regarded them with a shadow of tender feeling, she would not thus have dared to make mirth out of them; she would have hid them away in her escritoir, or her rast precious book of porms, and said nothing about them.

But the only keenness in his words lurked in the first ones: "He had sang the praises of a hundred others. It was nothing new for him to meet lovely women and string rhymes to ther in their honor. It was only an annusement."

Thus thought Chanatis, and such early list her gayety. Penn in, too, was a little out of humer. He lest his do he to special any more time in the valley; conclude the half is an assign fillow for the list three days, and that his baggage at the intil in the village needed attending to. He confined his enversation almost entirely to Mrs. Percy, was recryced but in frontly polite, and stole but an occur half glance at the continuity polite, and stole but an occur half glance at the continuity polite, and with crimson check and downcast eyes, as sping here if with some triding work.

Immediately after treakfast the next marning he was really to say good-by. Mr. and Mrs. Percy both warmly invited him to stop and see them whenever he should pass through the valley, and he accepted their invitation; he had now a most thoughts of returning another summer—perhaps the next.

If the hp of Chantle tremble ha little when she heard this, all had a see it; she was bright, and friendly, and calm who she gave him her hand to say farewell.

So he went away; and Clematis crushed a burning tear beinto a her cyclids as she watched through the lace of the curtion at her while w, and saw his form slowly disappear down the road.

"I, living in this so that element is never before met a man like blue—as now might hell, gifted, accustemed to the world, and to a limitation too, no dealt—for how could be help exciting it?" she narrhaned, with litterness. "But he has seen thousands of halles not only more beautiful—may, Clematis, book in thy infrare, child!—last in every way more althed to win his regard, killed in the acts and where the could have a prize; fashionally attirated."

The could have a like the could have a prize; fashionally attirated.

I care for that? Must I be admired in order to be happy? Have I not my books and music, and my garden, and my dear father and mother? I wonder why it seems so lenely living in the country—it never did before."

Resolved not to feel lonely, she tied on her strew hat and went down to the yard, forcing himself to sing a gay balled—"Comin' through the rye." When she came to the worls, "Ilka lassie has her laddie-Nane, they say, hae I,"

she broke down, and went on getting her flowers in silence.

This silence was presently disturbed by the rai ing of the gate latch. She looked up and saw their gaest returning up the walk, pale and limping, leaning upon a stick which he had picked up, As she hastened to him, her ing muous face spoke elequently of the fear and interest she felt.

"Are you hurt?"

"I sprained my ankle in jumping over a fence. It was very careless of me. I have dragged myself back for half a mile, and must wait, I think, until some wagon passes which is going to my destination. A foolish accident!" he said, forcing a smile, though he evidently suffered.

"I am so sorry," murmured Clematis. "Take my arm, do, until we get in the house, or lean on my shoulder. Mother will bind it up for you—she is very skillfal."

"You speak like Jane Eyre," remarked Pennen, in a reculiar tone, as he accepted her offer.

"Oh, yes, I remember! And you are Rochetter. I did not think of that when I spoke. But you have a good precedent in accidents.

"It does not ease the pain any, though, to remember that others have suffered. However, this is a more nothing. It does not hurt so much now."

Was it because he was clinging to the slin ler support so sympathetically offered him? They reached the him, and Mrs. Percy's skill was put to the test.

"It feels so nie ly. Thank you a thousand times," he said, after she had bathed and bandaged it, and he was extended upon the sofa in the parlor in an easy position.

"No; I shall not hail any wagon," returned Mrs. Per y, in answer to something be had said. "You have a little floreigh new, and it would increase very much if you endured the jar of illing nine or ten miles. Let your mind and body both rest, but do not be afraid that you are troubling us. We are glad to have you back, though we are sorry for your mistortune."

"Do not call it a misfortune, then," said Pennon, quite axly. "I ought to be content if you are. It is not every traised or wounted mortal that can be nursed in a place like this."

Christis brought him his clim r with her own hands. Arer that she read to him an hour in Tennyson's "Princes," and then left him to slember for a while. She felt very sony to rate pain he endured, but she was happy to serve him, and it into the thought that the could confer pleasure.

There was a mpany to ten. Is me relatives of Mr. Percy I de come to spend a flotte i towith him. There was an aunt, a litter come loding won in, tall as a grenadier, who were a Call pren late till pales, a blick silk apron, end three Hille twiles of couls down either of her hollow checks. Penn nalms sheller lather toles, for he was field as about "a i m, sweet voice in weath," and here was bad and creatthe samietthat she had she kindred if she could only have been may alout showing it, in her sold-will-! i. .r. bis was a superiolly lers a, a young reatherm of the attractive who was away during a vacation from his city, and had come to so "it his comin Charactis had .on n as pratty as she promised." He had attempt I to his ar when she met him in the hall (Pennon heard it all), dething that it was only a cominly right, but she had rejected "ar will rim a the planthat" he was at best not more than a second cousin."

"At which I hope to have care for rejoining," was the rejoinder.

Penn n tolk a dillke to him be, po he saw him, which was increased afterward. Julien Percy was as small as his in the was large; a dapper, dan lyish tollow, ebout with the airs of a collision partie. Peppishness can be traiven his explanation, and it was not that which each the dillke of Penn n. Sometime of it all sold is in his epecand continue in the many parties publication of the distribution.

The prejudice was mutual. Mr. Julien Percy had not expected to find a man so much ther in appearance, and in every way superior to himself, so perfectly at home in the house of his cousin. Pennon did not go out to tea, which gave the visitors opportunity to ask questions about him.

"I am surprised that you should have allowed yourself to be taken in by a more strolling adventurer, uncle," remarked Julien, with a slight sneer, when he had clicited the information he desired. "These traveling artists have not all of them the best of characters."

"Mr. Pennon is not a traveling artist; and if he men, it would be nothing to his discredit. Besides, he has told us all about his family, and his residence, and his purpoits," spice Clematis, with a little betrayal of excitement.

"Then all that remains for your prulence to disover, is whether his stories are true or not," replied her consin, colly,

"We do not doubt him. His face speaks for his trath" A red spot glowed upon Clematis' check. Her consin saw it and laughed.

"He has a very hand ome face, and such usually speck to young ladies eloquently enough, whether they speck truth or not," he said.

"You could not have had a feir opportunity of judging," replied she, and hughed at him so brightly, that he was sarely vexed at her remark.

"Don't let us quarrel," sail he; "equally about my beauty;" and he ran a hard, slender and white en ugh for a woman's, almost, through his straight black hair.

"I detest quarreling, so I will agree to the proposition," are swered Clematis; and having finished their teather they returned to the parlor together, looking so well-pleased with each other that a pang shot through the heart of the lame man—who was obliged to remain upon his soft and witness the number attempts of the new-comer to flatter and please. That very pang annoyed Pennon.

"Can it be," he asked himself, "that I am growning earli-

Is there ever an occasion upon which a woman can be so brilliant, so unconscious of her brilliancy, and to be without meaning to be, as when the her two admirers in her presence at once, each treating the other with marked but freezing civility, and both doing their best to please her? We are obliged to confess h, even of the most artless and truthfal; and so it is not to be wondered at that Clematis was very beautiful and very lewitching that evening; nor that her could hay awake some time that night dreaming waking dreams of the fine old homestal, the five thousand dollars in bank, and the beautiful creature, his future wifemer that the pain in Pennon's ankle kept him tossing until nearly morning.

The next day Pennon had a lonely time. Clematis was busy every moment. She had resolved to be polite to her cousin, and have some company for him. The gentle old horse was put in the chaise, and she drove around to the few hadles in the neighborhood and invited the young people over fir that evening. When she returned she had the rooms to arrange and some of the refreshments to prepare.

"What are you going to do with me, Miss Percy, in the milst of your happy guests? I think you had better send me off to bed at nightfall."

"No, in leed! I am going to have an easy chair and footstool in the nicest corner for you. Perhaps I shall crown you with flowers and place you upon a sort of throne for all my friends to do hence to you. Why, I depend upon you as one of the attractions of my company."

"Mr. Julien, I suppose, being the first."

"Of course," She replied, not the least disconcerted; "I make the party for him. But that you need not want for any attention when I am occupied with him, I have told a black-eyed friend of mine, Kitty Parker, that she must do her prettiest to entertain you."

" I do not have black eyes as well as I do soft gray ones.

The soft gray of the brother day, last of the sout and tend to be a very Of holy love.

They are more amiable,"

"Has all your previous experience given you no more tact than that in paying empliments? I could manage one more delicately myself, and I am but

" A youthful girl, in rustic guise."

She turned the full splen bred her eyes up a line as she spoke; she was not going to be abled by flatted.

"I shall not beg your perlin." said Pear, a, looking into them steadily, and strangely thrilled by their beautiful, mystic fire, "for I spoke only the truth. I have always for I a certain kind of gray eye, and yours have an or then continued the liking. I should like to look into them this in a re-

Now, in lead, the cyes wavered and sadd, and a symptotical kindle in her check, for something was in his visit built mere compliment.

"Until supper-time, perhaps," was her reply, with an attempt at gayety, and she went on in silence completing her arrangement of the parlor.

Every thing that her fairy heads touched to he from them a peculiar grace. She did not list a look, or plantation, or make a new fold in the drapery of a wind w, but the thing sensed infinitely improved. It was a color happines to a world-weary namelike Pennon to recline at his contribution old malagrany soft and water the years, in fill flat alout the quaint room.

It is sweeter than any remain e," he made to Magazine by and defly the partorns for the less Signature of the try; and I am show that the look graceful anywhere—for instance, in thing in the Magazine hot chormously rich, and she will not be likely to have a very wealthy husband, here in this natively at a Magazine I women if size over thinks of it— he had not explicit to Take I women if for so pure, a native, and he appears to But she has so much faith and the religious of the second description. The world be easily decrived in character. The main of here would be easily decrived in character. The main of here would be easily decrived in character. The main of here would be easily decrived in character.

"You are very feed of flowers?" he him, in the Character hands hangled in her sort, Findler water.

"Perhaps there are two many to be in the little. But this is the same of flowers, and we same it rejy them. They are better than now farmiture and hadden in a discovering which you think so?"

to loop back this lace curtain with?"

"I think they are exquisite."

Thank you. Now I am going to dress. I expect that you will smile at my attire, for I have not had a dress made for six months, and of course I shall be antesihuvian to a dweller in the city. As for the rest of the people, they will be as of bashioned as I, and I do not care for them."

She came down dressed when the tea-bell rang, for it was and she expected her guests early. She brought in Pennen's ten to the purior herself, and her heart beat with pleasure as she noted his admiring gaze. She had just left her mirror, and knew that she was looking well; if she had ust been very modest she would have known that she was radiantly levely. Her fresh complexion did not have to wait for the dazzle of artificial light-it could dare the fall glow of light which yet lingered at the window. Her cheries were like the velvet inner baf of a rose in their soft bloom. Her Lir was even mere lustrous than usual, for she had arrangel it carefully, giving it many a cumulag win l around her skillful fingers. She were a pretty light silk with print live about the neck and sleet a. Her arms and threat were bare; the half-high corrage of her dres giving just room to display the emerald necklace—for she had chaped that about her throat. She smiled when Pennen's eye fell upon it.

"I am not at all superstitions," sile said, "and I am gring to wear it. I suppose I am rather youtht date bad uning jewels, but I have taken such a fency to this."

"I do not know which gains by your wearing it, the careralls or your employing. What will your mether say, Miss Perev?"

"Oh, I do not believe she will care." .

"Why, con-in, that's a splendid mecklace you have," said Mr. Julien, strelling into the room at the moment. "What did it cost?"

"If all legends, presentiments, prophecies, and fears are true, it will cost me very dear," was the unsatisfactory answer, as she hurried away to her tea.

CHAPTER IV.

THE WORKING OF THE CHARM.

'Tis the middle of night by the castle clock, And the owls have awakened the crowing cock, To whit!—tu whoo!

With new surprise.
"What ails them my beloved child?"
The baron said—his daughter wild.
Made answer, "All will yet be well!"
I ween, she had no power to tell Aught else, so mighty was the spell.

COLERIDGE.

himself with observing the peculiarities of a me of the morng thin of the country people about him, a till-naturally, her with the love of acquainting him of with new year. It selfment which a citizen of the world have made him of his a latter through and through—could have made him of his as her that have made any where, unless it might be an any the Battalians that race of a wages of whom the Countries It. Philler even was a little afraid. He had traveled Best and West, North and South, and knew how to make him of a damate at that lattle country festivity. His picture was much talk by the admired, and some very original criticisms and remaining a played estilling for the others to damate.

Kitty sympathized with him very medical list sprained ankly, and his includity to denote the list as its could not lead off a catillion with her, talk her talks of which he had seen and heard, that interest I her very to the list eyes and his thoughts followed Clauseit.

When the company had all gar, as he limit I to be a upon the company had all gar, as he limit I to be a upon the company of Julien Percy, where all he is a line in a line.

a cejt, le taine la directing e de tipen the young girl. heart grew heavy, and he loar I to lift his ringer and say, "Beware!" She seemed to him, all of a sudden, to be invetal with dans rer misteriune, une en and unrecepnized, tot certain and class at head. Why he felt so he could not ! Il. Howas a condition networ, though he sellon exercihis power, and how he hall-denied that some magnetic relation was established between him and Chematis, which warned Line of a mathing about to happen to ler.

"One would think that a little play sical pain had effect ! my bain," he muranted to him. If, after billing his ecort golding he at the day. "Periops it is the sultriness in the air which oppresses me."

He leane lout of the window. The tale op., le was stilling; n talenth sirrel; the wet was black with a thundr . slorm. By an bly a bet wind out of the coming charles ruck his challe it without the marniferat but almost forth som as it swept mad by up from the horizon. Large draps of ran began to fall. He cle I his window to kep then ent, and, or play into by a lay lit ming to the awful ment of the classics. As his them has the throat, which reliable to be and translate and the invite to be verse from Childe Harold:

> " Sir, p or the real party of the life to the party of th With the contract of the late of the contract The property of the party of th There are a fill and the first tell Of post of the transfer to the first terms of terms of the first terms of te Orwind to the single special rest. But we the fire, On, the party later and 19 Order ye had at lat, lake early and late in nest!"

A terrible crash of them be out the let words short. It Was to the least open whelmand that he was estain the hear was stanch, and spring out of half the was dreaming own about him, and of his trader looked has the hall.

There has saw Jali a Percy flying at the one districted, his white night post n ? at the part thin, beating so contical atal so this late med that he has been a late of the line.

"Oh, d r?" cil lthe p r. m. e. p recivit I him, "wie re Lell we go to? We will our distribute of make I am go Add of Paris v. Mr. Proce I down was Maint mother!" knocking at her door, "I wish you would let me get into bed with you."

Pennon hobbled back and thing himself down on the bet to laugh. The idea of a youth of twenty-two still theing to his mother's side for refuge from apprehented danger, was very ludicrous to him. He was almost malicious enough to wish that Clematis might have—

"Clematis! what of her?"

He paused in his laughter, and a hell hims lithis question:
"Something has happened to her, I know. I wish that I dared to go to her chamber-door and ask, or that I knew where her parents slept that I might ask them to go."

Just then his door unclosed and she came in, glilling slowly, and pale as a ghost. He had left his lamp bruning to dim the glare of the lightning, and he saw her distinctly. She had not undressed. She was just as she was when he saw her last, except that the neckhace was gone from her heal, and her carls were partially put up in a c mb. He are se dult spoke to her gently, for he conceived that she was consign spoke to her gently, for he conceived that she was consign frightened. She made no reply, but she led so by him, he is ing at him with a steady but meaningless gaze. He to aght she might have a habit of walking in her slop, and to their her hand to arouse her. She shadd her from head to the at his touch, but gave no other size of consciousness.

Now theroughly alarmed, he aroused the house. It. Her parents were distressed and half out of their sines at her condition. They said she had no half of a simular also the was taken and had upon the bad in her own reads to retempts and had schafel, and every endeavor made to restore her to animation, for she so made to be a straing soft of a fit. She give no signs of recovery, except that our cortwice when Pennon chanced to touch her the same sheller went three half reme, and he grow abraid to approach her for fear of increasing her suffering, if she spiler has

"I believe that it is the callet of might," said Mr. Por y as he sat by her bold he and gazed up a hor in charact.

"Will not one go for a physical " sind his wir.

"I wood! that I knew the way, or that my fact was weal," answered Pennan; "but I will go, if I have to compound my knees, if you will tell me where."

Julien tood by, but the storm was still so severe that he would not have offered to go forth for any thing less than his own life.

"John, the hired man, can go. He knows the way, and can get on the horse and ride. I will go and send him," said the father.

Panen, as he picked up the fragments of the necklace from which har mirror rested. The necklace was severed in two pieces.

"Oh! that tatal handle!" cried Mrs. Percy; "I knew it—it was always so !"

All has a ned forward to examine it. It appeared wrenched that as by some great force, and the cold up on which it was strong was melted as by fire in one place.

"We will do h water over her, then," said the munt, who had her the wills more collected than any of the others.
"Mayle she will come to before the doctor gets here."

Pennen retired to his room and paced up and down rea lies of the pain his unlike gave him, until after the physician antived and had given his opinion.

The cold water had been effections in restoring her partially, for she moved her eyes, and seemed to recomize her himly though she could not speak. The dictor examined her threat. It did not appear injured outwardly; but after a lighter needle he was of opinion that a very light current of chatchity had pass I down the chimney, came out at the creative above the mirror, and fixed upon the needless just at the point where it was broken. He had die vero had his of steel-wire wound upon it. The mother said she know the emeralds had come apart, the links hoin; a little care had in one or two places, from long highing in the water, and that Chimatis had no included for the coession, in what manner she did not his water. The doctor was further of the opinion that the shock had had paralyzed her powers of speech, and that there was an at doctor they would never be restored.

"My child, my be within child! can it be that such a misfacture has one upon you!" me med Mrs. Percy in distress that was painful to witness. It was evident now that Charatis and region is them. She was asked to speak but made no reply; eshed to swallow some water, and when her his were presel apart with a speek, she made the desired effort with success.

"She can swallow, at let t," said the physician; "so there is no danger of her starving; and in correct it time perhaps her speech will return. I will consult with a physician in the city as soon as possible."

This was poor confort, but it was all that they call get. It was now almost morning, and no case then let of simple, but set drearily watching the rising of a levely lay; no call but consin Julien, who stells away to his one is and drapped into slumber in the midst of a characteristic result.

a person might even so that; equilibrate to include the father was a little part of the father was a little part of the father than built, at twice I shall be a from mother—and they do say that a wall of the father part fore—b, of come, a well and that I say a father prize. And then, too, fill will believe a father to be a Not so contours by the I was a father to will be I wall to I wall be I Pennen in the his way to the pall of a life is a common shutter, so they the window and may have a local interest. Jet faintly flushing at the coming son. Invery the a in the garden was henging out its energy part to another until the air was full of includent in light made by the young contheman was pale and to bit I. He strain, in the stillness of that solitary hear, to made him, and why he why that fair oil had be and no don't to him, and why he is to much did to seat her added in. It were to part the which so pained him.

Borsheen to the fire to the line of a line of the through heathy places and materials may be an improved. Once or twice, or thing, his heat held in the line of the line of the saving his distributed her held in the line of the line of her standler, a vision of loveline's, at the well, unless for one still more favorable. Lovers do not sook to analyze why they love; so Pennon was, perhaps, only asking himself why he was so structly interest. Beauty combined with anolesty, youth with dignity, amiability with intellect, fresh unsuffied toses and sympathics with sonse and discretion, innocence with a certain degree of wild an—these were enough to form his excess without recalling the arch smile, the sweet fire of the soulful eye, the joyous minth, the lovely tinge of sentition, the sweet behavior to her purent; the quick sense of day. These two latter might be all-fashioned virtues, scorned by many of the sex he had been most accustomed to associate with, but they were charms more fiscinating to Pennon than refined and voluptions in blence and a hishness.

"Oh, just and mercifed Heaven!" he mentaured, looking up to the caim sky, "why didst thou choose to smite such an one as this? Why did thine arrows of the fall upon the important?"

He remained at the limit thought until the bell call I him to the limin recease. He went to the table more to me take analy and inquire after the invalidation becomes here it is possible to cer. The appetites of addition below is less than the previous who fetels an what for appearance the — and the breakfest was a selection to the many is a of the previous evening.

Mrs. Percy Informed Permon that Character appeared quite Will, Was parkally in her il let mind, and had asset i tell I. r questions as will as sin was able by backs and q: sire; sail she dil not sull r; hel put h r mine d'ont her and his ther with a bricht smile, as rechaster by at the five her Bon account of her accident. All similar eres that my of the party had bearded, were discount. At or the man, heper was reciling one tell of practice which hal only letel a day er a welt; and a it was depressed who a Character in adjust the partition in the tell chackes where a woman was strack by lightning and make dend in a number of yours better to the sall above once the specia during a s vere thunder statut. This cate rise to a present deal of talk about the time to of the mernation but my, and the probability of the physician buting to course to it.

As they arose from the table, Pennon sail to his host and hostess:

"The stage passes here to-day at ten o'clock, I believe. I will not further trespass upon your bounty, but to on may way, not without a very sad heart at leaving you in this sorrow. I shall be in the city very soon, and shall come the very best physicians upon your danght r's case, and will to you their opinions."

"We are very sorry to part with you," replied Mes. Proy. touched by his evident emotion. "We have I am I to regard you as a friend, and har lly like to purt with you at this saltime. I should love to have you regard this is a hour, if you can be happy in staying longer."

" I can hardly think I am going away to know no accept the friends I so fortunately chancel upon. We n. y :: : again. But now, if I had no other reson for given I should harry away to find what can be done for your dander. Can

I see her, to say good-by before I go?"

Mrs. Percy told him he could go to her room in half an hour. He spent that time in pacing up and down the gurl nwalk. As he went up-stairs into the anter in commicating with Clematis's room, he hearla value and it remains and saw that the door was ajur. He had no had no had the tening, nor any idea that any thing private was being said with open doors, and was not to blam that the fill sile is no tences reached his car as he went forwar!:

"You have probably thought, coz., that were probably thought, coz., that were promarriage were injured by your misforms-that Cina Percy would not be as attractive as hitherto-but with a set lest, it is not so. I love you more devote lightime end -! should love you to distraction if you never spairs are: word. I have come to comfort you by off ring to mary ! Will you have me? Sperk -or no, write-I are a wait want von fed-two or three dar words-that you will be him. Here is the pencil—write!"

Penna went sally balt, and was lin bund. Large and for the coach to make its appearace.

"I must go and say factoril, thought-this will a cur the It will look very carde cor very ungrated. I was brill that coasin is out of the roam yet! I won ler if she are pick him!

Can the islaw really have more heart than I thought? I Lepo so, for the sake of her who is to be his wife,"

He went up to her room. There was no one in at that instant. She by upon the bel, looking calm and benutiful. She smiled a greeting as he came to her side.

"Miss Percy, I have come to say good-by!"

How harsh and cold the words came out of his throat! In treing to be calm he appeared almost rade. Her lip quivered, and her dark hashes drooped to her cheeks to conceal the intens; look of disappointment. She made a motion to give Lim Ler Land, but his tone had been so cold that she withdrew it, and it fell langually upon the bed.

There was a paper slate on the couch, with something written up m it. Was it dishonorable in Pennon, feeling what he did and what depended upon it, that he should so ke to read the trendling characters traced thereon? If it was, he was so agit to I that he dil not reflect upon it until later in the day, I at all swed his glance to rest upon what was all important to others besides Julien Percy:

"That my prospects of manings are injured, is no regret to are. I have parents, and love to live with them. I do not think of being well i; and if I should, it would not, e Int by to you, though I am grateful for your pref renes -yeur disinterested affection. I am your loving consin-I can never be any thing more to you."

"Clematis!"

Sho booked up esickly, for his tone had changed; it sent thy i'm I to her face before she met his eyes.

" (i., [1], " you and restore you to he dth."

He bent over and kissed her, and the tear which fell upon her check from his eyes at that moment thrilled through her i ir in a sweetly then even the thirt kiss which had ever ben present by other than relations up on her lips.

With the I vision Penron humi I into the hall, almost running over Mr. Per y, when he met there.

"Has is (" ... dis 1000 ?" asked the fitter. "I berry harm-I think she is very well. Will you not st planting recent the and Mr. Pray? I have something which refuses not to be said."

They well in the thermal cheef the deep.

"I love your daughter, Mr. Percy. I did not know how much until I went to part from her. I can not leave her—that is, with your permission to stay—while she is as she is now, or only while I ride to the city for commel. I have that this sadden—that I am a stranger; but I know that you will find me worthy of confidence. You can write to the whom you know in my native city and learn all about me. I will wait for your approval until then. But I wish the privilege of being near Clematis."

"Which I will not deny you, for I like you. But Clematis

-poor girl! have you spoken to her? She will hardly cars for a lover now."

me. I have not spoken to her. I waited for your permission. She may reject me; very likely she will—for what am I in the eyes of one like her? But if you say I may speak, I will go to her at once."

"Perhaps we had better wait for the letters," said Mr. Porcy, with a smile, "before that most important put is acted.

A fether's prudence-not a man's friendship."

CHAPTER V.

THE WONDERFUL CASTLE.

"In Yanuda did Kubla Khan
A stately pleasure-dome decree;
Where Alph, the sacred river, ran Through caverus measureless to man,
Down to a sunless sea.
Let whet the table of fertile map i
With walls and the vers were gained from d,
And there were first brings with state is rills,
Where these wild many an incensed man the holds,
And there were first, and incensed man the holds,
Unfolding sunny spots of greenery."

Courneys.

"With him held, as similarly best of the series of the And bastions fringed with the series."

TANKEN.

Physon was a , in upon his wand ring way in a mainche'v mand. He had be a rejected. He was not a very vain min, considering his advantages of personal appearance, grains, and worldly position. And yet it was true that he telt martine that the ingredient by a simple country madelen, wi. 180 many city billes would have be a pred this pref-Came. Heritt martified at times, but not always; for Clematis Pracy some I to him a being the graces of whose soul were such that no wouldy alvantages were to be held in compain u, nor any man to tel humilietel becare e she dil not rive him her leve. He selt that he had aspired to her love-: the which him his down to it; and because it was withheld Let 1.1 Marriso car, and he certainly did not Hame her. There was in his list at a taped by "an aching well," but a sature to the original and some overwhelming less. He had all reliable estadar il up a this new treates strongly, that when he recall it was not for him, he folt as if he had lost what was his.

He had grown very tirel of the like he was leading in the div, before he went from it. It was a restless desire to find if the field of life could not be really I which sent him forth to rave one; the country in quet of some new experience.

Suddenly as light breaks through a rain cloud and plurs in glory over the world, a new hope had thooled his being with radiance and reyealed to him the pluralise he had unknowingly yearned for. He had cried "Burcha!" to his rejeicing spirit—and now how dull, and selfish, and commonplies the world had grown again!

In a desponding, if not in a bitter frame of mind, he wandered listlessly from place to place.

He went to Lake George, and sketched and painted for a while; but his genius seemed to have forsaken him, except as far as painting female faces went. His attempts at other things seemed all to term, as if by fairy wand, into head a heads with spiritual gray eyes, byfor and pract learn these sof rich brown hair, lips that seemed even upon care so tremulous with feeling and melody, and form all a lips delicately fair than expressive of thought and head all a lips.

He met filends at Luke George who did not in the line plain upon his altered demeanor, and to discuss in his platures, but is to who the head in of his course. I meditations might be they were tably in the desire of his course of meditations might be they were tably in the desire of his course for the of the Tiber Creek Valley or the course to the result but it mesh but a mether how, like Jarob, he had not a find help to the well had afterward his edder, as I had a find help to the well not because of having his self has one had be help to the never to have that joy as in. The estimate he hapter the lously to hims If, and the sing only make them in the train of holies reserved to them.

As we have hinted before Penner was a new two. He had a pendiar power of "winning of the epides in all sorts of prople"—perhaps becare his own materials so truthful and affectionate. Even at Mr. Datterly's it is been guessed by his fellow-increases that they own has extra allowance of ounces of white super and fresh hat rate his presence at table. Their limitally was a work in in the sort of whose soul, prudence and the love of prace outpylled his street and the love of her kind; but Penner had jumped to be into the Balter had on a and brought it by later the which may be set hown as or one list mest service at the later.

One morning he had a letter which he read upon the partico of the hotel.

"Well, Pennon, what news—good or bal?" asked his filed! Neyse, who saw a change pass over his countenance.

"Mest people would think it good news. You have heard me tell of that eccentric old bachelor who spent his whole terume of two hundred thousand dollars upon fifty acres of hand, and a castle which he built in its midst, living thereafter in it, solitary, like a spider in the center of his web of glory. I believe I was almost the only human being he ever funcied, after the young hely deceived him, who was the ruin of one of the most splendid of men. Well, he is dead, and has left me his castle and surroundings."

Whew! me t people would call that pretty good news. You were born with a gold spoon in your mouth, my dear friend. There is no use in your friends standing by and covering the delicities of th cting the delicious morsels you fish up with it."

Penuon heaved a deep sigh.

"How little is known of people's rad fortunes—the fortunes of the heart—whether they are good or bad. I assure you, Noyse, I am not to be envied."

"Yet I'd e'en take the burden of that little love-affair upon my spirits, for the consideration of your good looks, good gifts, and good luck."

"Phaw! Dve affair!" muttered Pennon.

"To be The it is strange that you could be unfortunate in love, unless the hely of your choice be dead. But if it is not that, what is it that keeps you so low-spirited, ch?"

"In lignation, perhaps. Let us think of this new turn of the who I, Noyse. What do you say to making up a party of our friends here, three or four of them, and going up to St. Coll to look at the castle, and to stop awhile if we like it?"

"Glorious! Now that you speak of it I shall be impatient until we start."

"Very well, then. We will have Penelon and his beautiful wife-"

"And her still more beautiful sister."

"Yes; and that is all. I know they have nothing to do but ille away the summer, and if they are ready we will start to-morrow."

On the 12th of July the party of placement tell by Pennon, having traveled for thirty-six homes by roll and boat, were left by the great steamer which dolly farmwel the waves of the St. Cell, on the dock of a little village several rolles from the estate they were in search of.

The travelers had heard glowing to courts of the so nery latween this village and the costle—is the projector had named his mansion—and learning that a ferryman could be procured to row them slowly to their destination, they protected this more romantic manner of reaching it. The other meon was fine. As they glided out into the millie of the broad, fair river, they felt upon their brows the refreshing collness of a breeze sweet-scentel with the north mappings. The banks sloped gently down to the water, and were given with waving grass, and dotted often with the project chas. Here and there one of those stately trees had the river's brim.

As the boat shot marmaringly along butter a filler title, the grassy slopes rose into warded her like or so that it is mantic vales.

While they were all grain; at a hill, which how his, principle to be dignified as a mountain, standing solitory his is turned at about a distance of a mile up the strain, their attention was drawn away by a glimpse of turnets, dones, and hards ments rising from among a forest of trees is the application them and the height.

"The castle! the castle!" exclaimed all.

Rosalie Sloane sprang to her feet.

"Sit down, love," sail Mrs. Pendou, the material of the party, albeit she was but twenty-four years of and "You will upset the boat, and then what would be made of ust"

"Why, the igentleman would record to I separate would do no harm to tax their allustry a little to the jest so that they need not form to that they are empered to be calculated as;" and Rosslie turned her being the blue open half-record fully, half-laughingly upon Pennon.

wont to be less than the about that it is a local transporter among gentler up that the last by sorting a local proteint, and been treated with a first transporter.

liteness, with at one so an paner of sentiment, one represed sigh, one tone made thailling with deeper meaning than the words confered—and she therail, as she turned her face to the other side of the river, and post the risk, red lip, that it was "too bad!"

wish we could get a more satisfactory view of it," burst forth Noyse, striving to pierce with his corr glance the depths of foliage which protected the castle from view.

Just then an eponing in the foliage revealed a wing and part of the main body of the building. Every one uttered an exclamation of delight; but the heat sweet on so rapidly that it vanished before they realized its beauty.

It seemed to be something in the style of the old Moorich palaces; and yet not that, being more long and elegant. It was a mixed architecture, but plant I by some one of original galus, for it was very brautical as a whole; to be compared, perhaps, to a warm and passionale love-song translated from the Italian into words of social English splender, and breaked to a proud but tender English beauty. So it somethe Pennen, but the comparison is surely also red.

"It is not like any thin; that I ever so up a the Rhine or in Italy, or in England either," remarked Noyse, who was a creat talker, and always interrupted those silent moments of enchantment which people of more sentiment keep screek. "I have never seen any thing preciety like it in any look of drawings. I wonder why he called it the castlet. It is not grand nor glowing on ugh 1 r such a title. I should tilink..."

At that moment the beatment turned the shift to the shore, and they were in tall view of the place, and in front of an avenue hading up to the hall. Soon Pennon stock up as theck of play marble placed as a landing at the fact of the avenue, and was helping the ladies out.

The party were dispend to be very any, but the thought of the dead friend who had passed there has lest years of a useless and disappointed life, saddened Petaton.

"Love shall not rain me as it did him," he mutter !.

"Which way?" cold Rusalie, tarrying for him, while the others, all curissity, I st themselves in the winding puths which branched of from the main welk.

She had taken off her bonn t, and her light heir glistened with a golden tinge in the sunlight; her form was tall and full; her step had something languid and yet majestic in it; her complexion was as delicate as likes and will ross:

"Her cheek is fair, with just as much
Of color as would be,
Suppose a moist mess-rose should beach
A lily lovingly.

Her hair like wavy silk seems spun By fairy worms, which fed Upon the gold rays of the sam. And gilded thus the thread."

She was a fine-looking, fascinating woman. Pennon realized it as he quickened his steps to meet her. She boked, even there, queenly enough to be "Going to St. James's Court In beauty and in state;"

and he thought how well she would grace one of these furnionable homes which she coveted. She was not wealthy, and her friends were desirous she should make a brilliant match.
This she could have done more than once, but it was so pleasant to be admired that she was in no haste.

A glow of exultation had lether had therefore she waited that instant for the guidance of her had. She had had had been yielding to an interest which she filt in him, and the idea of being mistress of such a home as she saw had rether put the finishing perfection upon his attractions. So, as well as her sister and brother-in-law, had taken this invitation as a mark of particular favor toward her; though if they had her wanting truth, they need not have built men had you in the rit was more to please Noyse than himself that MIs Really Standard one of the party.

"We shall reach the house easily by this may," said P norm. They followed a habyrinthine walk, shall be now it is a varieties of trees, some towering bailty, calors be a like bandle a weight of fruits or flowers. They had allowed said to the protoce, funciful summer-loses, and states of a hadly in lonely nooks. Birds world has lifted the known believe walks nesses; for the solitary owner of all this spirit of had list up and their reverses but soldern; falling was in harmoned had marble basins.

"How sweetly one might live and die in a place like this," also st whispered Rosshe. "Oh, I love seeh beauty as this."

"You love beauty, I know," answered Pennon, with a smile; "for you love your own dear self; which is only what the rest of the world does also,—loyes you more than you doserve."

She did not know whether to be pleased or provoked at this speech. She wanted to say something which should draw from him the innermost meaning of his remark—perhaps to induce him to say that he, like the rost of the world, was her lover; but Noyse, uneasy and jedour, was waiting for them, and they joined him.

They alvanced to the havn where Mr. and Mrs. Fencion were awaiting them, entered upon a stately portice, and from thence passed into the principal hall, who estained eles window, floor of white and black marble in mesaic, lotly celling, and grand stairway excited still further their almiration.

There were but two savants about the mansion—a flithful old man who had charge of affairs generally, and his wire, who acted as housekeeper.

"Oh dear?" said Pennon, as they rested themselves in the hall, before seeking rooms, "I am afraid that my friend's gift will impoverish me. I can never afford to keep up such an establishment; and out of respect to the wishes of the deal I should never wish to sell it."

"Ah, you can after like therethen you think," sell Results.
"This place is not so here as it is righly tamished. A very few servants would be up it in proper or left. It will take but a triffing expense to keep up the grown is."

"Yet talk like a look hoper—that is, like one who has any i but of dome the expense and arranginesis, as every woman ought to have," said Noyse.

"That is, if she marries a poor man."

The sicht, very slitt amont of some with which this was sill, considering that North was not by any means a nich man, was pror constitution and reward for fillowing in the train of the bill at expects for the last two months. The color outlies had his face, for he filt took cply to entirely concell his facilitys, and thus be less at the mercy of her who will have took high rich had be less at the mercy of her who

Before any one spoke again the her selective orders and conduct the halfes to their rain. Pernengave her liberty to send to the village and process which is she needed in waiting upon his cursts. She was drawed in deep mourning, and appeared very sad; but her new master evidently made a favorable impression, and she went out lacking more cheerful than when she came in.

In a few moments apartments were really for the lalles.

"Oh, how charming! how perfectly entrancing!" exclain-ed Rosalie, as she entered the one all to let her. "If I was the mistress of it!" she marmured, as she threw hers if into an easy chair. "I must be—I will be! and when R all all all and says 'I will,' then the thing mest count to past!"

She arose and approached an immers mirr, which reached from floor to ceiling, and was set between the draging of the windows overlooking an et levely second. Then also gazed upon her own loveliness with a much interpretes if it were now to ber, when, if the trather up the tell, she spectomany an hour in that sume error ble compates. That the result was, as usual, satisfactory, might be tell by the interprete called a fathering about the full corners of her related the beaming out, lustrous and down, from the length of the length of languistics shadowing for these called

The draperies of her apertment were of result outs. colored stripes, should down into a white er well, which has duced a very sent light and chemical off the account or and the functure was testful, corresponding in all things, and fully the enough to awaken there were new of the branches beauty.

"I shell keep this moon for my own, whom I am nistress of this mansion," she whispered, as she have noted by the total is for a feedmating tollet in which to make her eight and teal "Dear! what shall I do for help to the mail arrives?"

Pennon, when he was left above by his retiting great, walked back and forth through the ball.

"My filed I little thought, when he left me this, that he was making a fitting choice of one when now live it we did be to follow his example of colliney; or, what were notes, to many some worm note is a night one of his heart, when his implications not with his hand and name. This latter shall never be. I will not all my own to the fit. Little list of unhappy or sellen or unprinciple l'marriages. I have dreamed est a marriage est soul and hearts—a union of the noblest and most spiritual one purpose, one love, one hope for the fature-a marriage as Histid as never en ling—a marriage for to day and not the less for eternity. O Clematis! why dilst thou disuppoint me in this dream! Wast thou cold? coquettish? wayward? I can not decide. I only know that thou didst cruelly do 'roy the hope that I had built from thine own sweet, spiritural smile. If I did not see love in thine eyes, such as my smile willly cravel-if I did not see love in thy blash, and hear it in thy voice, then indeed did my sub-approbation make no Ulin I am I deef. Why am I ever living over in memory the moment when thy refusal fell like a stone upon my heart! like a stone above a grave, it lies there never to be like!--"

His melancholy reverie was interrupted by the fall of the lightest foot, the rustle of the righest silk, and looking up he met the smile of Miss Rosalie Sloane, as she swept, in the charm of her fresh toilet, down the magnificant staircase.

CHAPTER VI.

CAUGHT IN HER OWN NET.

Barbara hath a falcon's eye,
And a soft white hand, hath Earbara;
Beware! for to wish to make you die.
To make you as pule as the Leon of I,
Is a pet trick with Barbara!

ALDRICH.

"To-morrow the week which we had proposed to stay is out," said Pennon, at breakfast one day. "I have come to the conclusion that no cooler, more retired, and confirm he place in which to endure the heats of August, can be tame! If the rest are of my opinion, we will delay returning to the world for a month yet; and, for four that a said will solve upon my fair friends, I will write for a little more a myany,—that is, if there is any room for them. How is it, Mr. Fencion? I gave you the duty of accordining our results."

"There are two chambers, well fitted up, which are vicinity

"How delightful you are, Mr. Pennen," cried Realis, in her most silvery voice. "I came very near to wastler a terr upon an anticipated farewell to this leady specialist very morning, before I came down. Now I will save it for a mother occasion."

"That is well. You have none too many la stre, and ought to keep them for tome cocasi n when there is a make lutely necessary. Now, if ever desperate, rejected sale, should commit suicide, you would not do like Thackeray's heroine—

"Charlotte, when she saw his body
Borne before her on a shutter,
Like a well-conducted person,
Went on cutting bread and butter."

I do not think so badly of you as that. I sincerely believe that under such circumstances you call fine that that the which you came so near shedding this at ming—just fir its believe inguess, if nothing more."

"One never knows when you are in carnest, Mr. Pennon," she rejoined, with a charming pout. "I am sure I do not think grief is so very becoming;" and she looked over at Noyse, who seemed to be blessed with a poor appertite.

Her taunt was more severe than witty, for she had had the triumph of refusing him the previous evening. He was not a fool, nor without considerable spirit, although she had blinded, bewildered, deceived, and scorned him. He lifted a half-angry and contemptuous glance, and gazed at her more steadily than passion had ever allowed him to do hitherto.

"If Lady Rosalie' Sloane ever expects to see my body borne before her on a shutter," she is laying up tears to dry for want of use. It would be folly to give one's life for an offering to vanity, false-heartedness, and capricious beauty."

"How do you dare, sir! One would indeed guess you to be an unfortunate suitor."

Her cheek flushel with indignation.

"I should not dare to accuse you of caprice or falschool," he answered, with the most malicious coolness, "if I did not remember, too well it. my own peace, the light in Rosalie's eye, the smile and blush in her cheek, when we sat to rest after climbing that rock at Lake George; and when, embolioned by her soft and tender look, I—"

"Mr. Noyse!"

Her face was pale and her look imploring.

I thought as pure, and in that moment tasted happiness which is now to thrill me with an unsatisfied longing forever."

She burst into terrs and left the room. Mrs. Fencion followed her; Mr. Fencion muttered "vill in!" and went out upon the balcony; Pennon followed Noyse to the front portico, and found him leaning, pale and excited, against a pillar.

"How could you take so unmanly a revenge upon the poer girl?" he asked, almost sternly, of his friend.

"God knows I am sorry! I would apologize, but the mischief is done. I suppose it was base of me; but the truth is that I was afraid for you too. Penden—and it that she would play off the same arts upon you that she did up a mar, and I like you too well to see you make a vistim off. If you end have heard her laugh last night, when I called that seems to mind in proof that I had received encouragement to make the avowal which I did—if you had heard her laugh, Penden, you would not blame me!"

He almost ground his toth toth r.

"No doubt you have been very mach owner. I. New it is party that you see you have spoiled our party, and as this matter is made up. You need not have four different a root, my himl; not that I do not acknowledge the beauty of Miss Stock but I read her character long ago; has it s, I hav —"

He prused without finishing the sent mer. Notice of the rentlemen gue sed how very sharply the armore had placed into the supposed invulnerable heart of Res. No; for that hard had become fully fixed upon the owner of the costle, and she knew that truth the mest compaleus on him is sty the most pure were qualities which, above all others, her limited in women. Her mortification was extreme ended to profile the figurest malice. Poor Noyse! he was considered by the with spirit and pride upon occasion, but he him has required too deeply, and loved too much not to receive the quences of his resentment.

The whole party was placed in an activate site it.

Noyse's going away would suredly better the nather; and Pennon was put to his wit's end to rest require that a little ment to his gue ts. While Readle was yet upestale, she iller burning tears of mortification, and studying upon what is put take to do away with the impression make he will be a little.

friends to join their party.

"I can not go to Pennon and tell him that I is true," must also ; "much I so co. I till him that I am hardly as heartless as I som, and picother all reson for the change in my conduct. Oh, that all his that I have ful Noyse! I was very near boing him on a; I the relate I loved him when I permitted him to his me. at inly; but the next day Pennon came, and—and—my follows chair him But I can not tell him so" ily, fair-looking, with some noble qualities of head and heart, although rash and impetuous; and Rosalie was really so much in love, that she was willing to have a large fortune out of Lis attractions, and accept him without it, when Pennon and le his appearance. Considering that she had been chicated to regard wealth as jadispentable, it was a proof that some time womanly feeling still Heome I beneath the artificial flowers in her heatt's posture, that she had been so near to taking a man el' such moderate in ales. Love was near to triumphing over lacre, when Pennon, with both fortune, family, and innanalle other endowments, unfortunately chanced too near; then, in order to free Lersch from her more than half-committed to Noyse, she had been obliged to act with more duplicity as I more hearths, ne s than was natural even to her. Now s'as was respine, in the litterness of humiliation, the harvet siell sown.

While she was yet weeping, her sister knocked at the dear. "How mounly Mr. Neyes has conducted himself," she said, as she entered and throw her arms about Resalie. "Just tell me, my love, that what he said was not true, and I will inform Pennon of your word immediately."

"But it was true, Bertha. I did not mean to deceive Mr. Noyes, for in lead, in lead I thought I loved him at that that. But when I saw Pennon I—"

"Yes, dear, I know. And you chees very wisely, too. 'I shall tell our heat that you did believe that your affections were encored to his friend, but that you discovered that he had a bad temper."

"O Bertha!"

"He I will make this matter as near right as it can me made."
So cheer up, darling."

Mis. Ferelon his I her sister, and went with her proty for and winning ways, to smooth over all discrepancies to Pennen. She was not strictly conscientions in all she sail—I it say had her sing, and that was the way they were not in the noting of the very real case for Rossile's interest in the noting all this of his. Notice her willings to marry without much fortune, etc., etc., until she found out his sudden and dangerous fits of temper, and was afraid of unhappiness, etc.—all of which her host hear I with politices and kindness; said Noyse had been rule; was really to apologize; hoped the ladies would accept his frien is excess, and all would be happy again, for he had some bright plans for the coming month, and wanted all to participate in them.

So with the offender's apologies, and his host's entreaties for him, Mrs. Fenelon went back to her sister.

Rosalie came down to dinner looking most queenly. The superb dignity of her air was just softened by the flash of ters which still lingered upon her checks and gave new billiancy to her eyes. It would have seemed profanity to have treated such a being with any thing but tender a lmiration; and Noyse wondered how he could have been such a brute, even with the memory of yesterday ringing in his ears.

CHAPTER VII.

THE MYSTERY.

Cluster sweets of every clime;
All the charm of vale and highland,
Ripening with the breath of Time."

Mrs. Nichols.

This is her glove, her jasmine-scented glove, Which she hath dropp d—and if she had not breathed This air, it never would have been so sweet; Her eyes have left their splender in this place."

A wirek or two more had spel away; new guests had arrived at the castle, and the most of them were going out one morning upon a boating exeursion.

"We seem to be living in the days of the Arabian Nights; every thing is like enchantment here," said Lulu, a child of thirteen, who was one of the new arrivals.

Pennon was fond of children; and most always had some little girl for an especial pet.

On their way to the water, they passed through the garden, and from thence into a grotto, the entrance to which was nearly concealed by the josmins which clambered over its rocky sides. Making their way into this, they heard the river dashing with a sound almost like that of the sea against the rocks at their fict, which had been cut down into convenient steps; and at the bottom of which, glittering in the sunshing into which they again energed, they saw the boat.

It lay upon the water graceful as a swen. A gilled seat, lined with crimon cushions, ran around it. The sail was of snowy linen, edged with a crimson cord, and a small silken benner of the same color, and striped with gold, floated from the top of the mast.

"Do you not think it a remantic boat-house?" asked the hot of Rolli, as they stole out swiftly from the shadow of the grotto.

"Every thing is romantic here. How strange that your friend should have built blinself a police like this for the solf-ish pleasure of enjoying it in solitude."

"He was not a schish man," said Pennon, "or did not mean to be. He was unfortunate. Perhaps when he plans this place he expected to make a paralise of it by sharing it with the woman he loved. But hell s are sometimes dealer?"

Rocalle looked over the side of the lost into the water.

The south wind, bulmy from the blooming sires, blow them along until the spray which broke away trom the prower g'ittered like a wreath of jewels hung around it.

The scenery seemed to the sailors more picture are than that below the castle. The ascentian covered with pines, stood on their right; on their left were slight backs with groves growing down to the water's older.

There was a beat in the river where it swept ar and the base of the hill, and as the boot followed its correct the party came in sight of a small island lying sweetly on the local of the stream.

Pennon had told them nothing of it, the models had visited it hims if a day or two testore, wishing to surprise them.

"That is the 'bright little isle of which M is spake. I expect, from its appearance," he said, "and the medical firm an hour or two of exploration. No patient years I firm sweeter spot:

Hore a laf never dissin the still be in the bar.
And the fee banques cu the order to be in the res."

All eyes were attracted to it as they approprie. 1. 1.

Underneith the trees, which may be important they could see shadowy vistes, phasant with the last of harmony files or a They were welcomed by a radio nation to the harmony files countless bright-winged birds flattering and it is supplied in a test fragment being their bills into the fragment being a radio as some.

Every one was easer to spring upon the slining each while hy like a girlle of gold about the island. Protegold in column the island. Protegold in column to the shore; but no one could step at that no upon the selection, for the cold shade will be the manner of the local state.

birds, the rushing of the river, to other with the perfume of flowers, made the air dreamy with sweets.

They had not gone for into the island before they discovered, cheltered in a thicker force, the fanciful roof of a summer-house. They drew near, a limiting the slender pillurs and the curious lattices work which covered four of its octaon side, the other four being open to the breezes and the birds; and also the mosting of the lofty branches of the oak-trees above its cilled minarct. Upon entering it, they found oaken safes placed against each lattice and a round table standing in the center. They were just wearing anough to sink contents by upon these seats.

The outside of this pretty papella was overrun with tartaian Loneysnekles, whose sweetnes at evening would have been overpoweding; but now it was delightful, not only to the people within, but to a swerm of wild book that, happy as the les of Hybla, sang and swarmed without,

Realle was the first to notice a book lying open upon the ratte. She took it up and found it to be a velume of Brye. and spectry, open at the "Forest Hymn."

"Some one has been here before us," she sail, "s me conjugate sessing taste, for there could not be a more apprepalate place for the realing of this noble hymn," and the real about, with exquisite emphasis, a few lines; then, each by turning the law, she came to the mann of the owner in all don the lamb that it is to see "Count's Pary"— with a partty commence."

No carn the 1 the sadi a paller of Pennen type I caing the read of the woman Le Lach thes unexpetelly speken. He receive the heneysuches from the vince of the white the heneysuches from the vince of the paller of the region his compense.

" I'm when are you bin ling that epper dyely sweet garland?" asked Rosalie, following him.

a head as golden. "There, pictly one, run and see if cli Gillen is in sight-I know you are hungry."

"Yes! there he comes, to ming a back to be a him with laugh I the little girl, b unding lack, a m ment after.

Galleon was the purveyor-general, who followed the party in a craft of his own, having in charge a carge of dainties for fair led and brown pen to the first themselves with on an occasion like the present. The summer-laws, with its contentent table was willingly resigned to him for the time being, while the party dispersed its liamid the grows as inclination led. Rosalie could do no better then get up a proby ramp with Lulu; for Pennon was absorbed in that stapid look which she wished the unknown woman had not be now fregetful as to leave; and Noyse was paying be it has part of a doct in her own coin—since the new arrivals he had loft bur to herself—try as artfully as she might, she could not precise that she retained a fraction of her power over him.

Sitting at the foot of an elm, the host former his company, in the whirl of conjectures which dance I through his brain. Whence this book? Dil spirits bear it be lily through the air, and deposit it in this lonely island to remire him of that fur-away being whom he still lovel, despite of he rejection of his suit? Or was Clematis herself so near to him that he had but just missed sping her? Had she here here? What could have drawn that quiet form its daught in the this is must and almost unknown region? He was in a more of purpleatity. He turned every page, as if he would need therein the arrower to his questions—but the book would not tell him what he wanted to know. "De lunchern is really to sall," said the swart Galleon, gleaming out of the page h, as turbund sort vants gleam out of the page has of the Orient.

"Blow the horn, then," ordered the last. "Havint you a tin-horn, or a cow-bell, Galleon?

"Blow the hugay, Beat the gonguin.".

"Havint no tin harn, man, but I'm a ting as her a fill' squelcher what I made do have made will"

"Rattle away, then;" and the meaning domin's of the time pen reverberated through the exchant life studies, flightening bee and bird, beech and blooms, into all the

The group chattered like mapples over their cells with its sandwickes, ambrosial wines and iced sweets—all bet the host, who said as little as he ate, which was little exceed. It saids noted these signs, almost hoping they were the tolerand his having been seized with an affection of the heart, which was, indeed, true, though the cause was for removed to an any apparent source.

As son as he could, without rulen as, slip away from his guest, Pennon started and roamed over every foot of the island; he half expected to meet the vision of a fair young girl, as mute as death but as lovely as light, flitting undernath the shadows, or wandering on the beach.

But nothing so unlikely as this occurred. Having searched the groves, he kept along the silvery sand which edged the shere, looking up and down the river with a yearning gaze, as if something were yet to be revealed to him.

Sældenly, something glimmered at his feet; a sanb-am struck it, and it theshell out into thousands of fiery spackles. He stooped and picked it up—it was the Emerald Necklace!

Robinson Crasoe, when he came upon the footprints of the swages in the sun I, was hardly more astounded, though not so pleasantly so. Unseen by any but the approving eyes of Mother Nature, he pressed the treasure to his lips, holding it up again and again to assure himself of its identity. Yes! the sune—even to the still unmended links, whose feeble hald had been severed by the lightning. Mysterious jewels! ever to play some sail, or strange, or inexplicable part in the drama of life. How came they there?

The gorgeous circlet, thishing in the similant, seemed to work upon him a dreamy spell. He thought of the snowy throat they had circled—whose warmth they had felt—whose softmest they had kissed—he thought of the lovely suffer, stricken dumb by that toname of milnight fire!—how patient she had been—how beautiful in her addiction. Ah! he would have wasted his life in serving her, and making her mute missortunes more bearable!—but she had gently, but throly sent him from her.

Here was evidence in plenty that she had been near—or if it she herealf, then the very witches had been! and this was hardly the era of necromancy.

There was something to awaken superstition in the mystic, glowing, wavering thish of the gems.

"How beautiful! how magnificent?" It was the voice of Roulle who spoke; size had followed Pennon, weary of the time where he was not, and had found him had a dream over the norther, which had had be the rays of the declining san. "It is not; the year have boundary things or are as this.

in this wild sp t, Paul?"—it was nearly the first time she had ever called him by his first name, and she spoke it now very tenderly. "Why! they are superb, those emeral is! it would give Tiffeny & Co., a glow to so them. Let me exacise them, will you? The setting is very antique, very. It has rusted apart in places, from a pe, although of the parent of the parent of they must have him here ago, as you might say."

"I do not think they have been here long, Mis liv."

Oh, they certainly must have been here for not The Indians never made any such orners atts. They and there been buried with some princess of a rare long single extinct who lived in a splen for like that of ancient Perus and new the river has worn into the shore until it has wash I this trinket from her grave. I always preferred on a disto all the other precious stones. These must be worth quiet like fortune."

She did not return them to Penn a. She soul, then, admiring them by word and look. Her whole artists sail, "give them to mad!"—her eyes were full of a country's fonding a and a stable rested on her face. She know that the young man was generous, and as he had no near this littles to need such a bauble as this, it seem it is her fill proper and probable that he would say—

"Keep it, my dear Miss Rosallo. I have noted for an article like that, myseld" But Pennon had no said it at Reaching out his hand for the gams most relationally residual. Reaching out them into his vest-pocket with at saying another word about them; and vexed at her disappoints of application, his abstraction, Rosalia was girl when they can be in a single of the rest of the party.

onback immediately," sell Pennon, spinning hat the lower, and gallantly stratching forth a hear in ail of the loodies. "The cook cautional manual to keep dimar will a unless we wished to spoil it."

Hardly had the boat shot out into the stream is climated corded sail and golden-striped penn antibute that in the sail shine, and its passengers full of mirth and vivally, when not a were passed, at a safe distance, by one of the scholars is which plow our western and northern lakes and the sail the sail.

shout of admiration burst firm the crowd of passengers upon her decks—chaost all of them being out to enjoy the bouty of the day—at sight of the strang and bountard little vessel which belonged to the castle. Their shout was answered back with one as merry, if not so great, and there was a flutter of han likerchiefs among the balks on either side.

What possessed Pennon? he had started up to reaklesdy, as almost to upset the boat, and was waving his handkerchief wildly, as long as the steamer could be discerned. Then he eat down silently, saying not a word, till the bank was moored in the fairy grotto.

CHAPTER VIII.

UNDER THE CATALPAS.

I know you, Clara Vere de Vere;
You pine among your halls and towers,
The languid light of your proudeves.
Is wearied of the rolling hours.
In glowing health, with boundless wealth,
But sickening of a vague disease,
You knew so ill to deal with time,
You needs must play such pranks as these.

The long hours of a hot summer ale moon were also of intelerable to Roodle Sloane. Not because of the heat and languar of the atmosphere, for she flourished in the summar-time like a magnificent white fly; but this afterness was wearing me to her, because she was disappointed and doponting. Pennon was walking up and down an avenue of our lpus, as if there were no other person in existance except himreal-she could be him from her window. Herey there she ere so build be him from her window. Herey there she can be furthering curtain, and shed a along at the form pairs by the fluttering curtain, and shed a along at the form pairs by the fluttering curtain, and shed a along at the form pairs slowly forward and book in the challow of the trees. At the opposite end of her room was an object equally interesting at which she also took a linguing glance at every turn of her solitary prementale—her own into the reveal of in the tail piergless. In vain she questioned the rosy shalow of L r own lips, why they had no power to aliare him from the silenes which he seemed to prefer—in vain she asked of her own the eyes why their soft and swimming depths held no mysted sfor him to study—there came no satisfactory represents to her deeply-vexed spirit.

Rosalie was in an uncomfortable, in it depreciation of the Nothing but the subtle art which gits such women with unfailing grace, would have made it tolerable. Her relations with Noyse could not be pleasant; she know that he real hor purposes as in an open book; a jedoos, yet scornful spotter of every advance which she made toward a rival who was, in turn, most mortifyingly indifferent to hor.

She thought it all over as she preed her rom until she fairly struck her forchead with vexation, grin ling the holl of her tollet-slipper into the carpet in a danger us way. Ros lie—indolent as a water-lily lolling on the los in of a structum in the sunshine—aroused herself to yow that matters should empto a crisis.

Again she looked in the glass. A half blown crims a rest flowered in a little vase upon the table; she placed it in the sunshine of her hair; her dress, white, of the select, showing In his lawn, profase in its folks, light as the transmit is waved it, was already perfection. Stry! that sour chamber colored gauze—she fistened it over the back of her had had a turqueise pin, catching it up over one had by here run from which the loose flowing share sweet away has the ming of a angel.

She was going to meet Pennon-'y a liber. It will down the brood storeas take an interact this teller, sinvafed herself out into a side avenue; then which so wandered to the river's edge, through a thick teller sea, of the an an open lawn, around and about, until side cance into the restalpu-walk, from a direction of the time of the

"Why, Mr. Pennon, you out this saltry at the saltry " For do not look as if the Argest and I had I have any, Miss Shane. You look as cool and first as a partie of the depths of the sea—as cool—

"As a commber," said Reduction of the later that a later the transfer to her as it he were pring to said —" — I said out it ting"—

"you know I love the summer forvor of this month-at suits me. I enjoy the the most fally, now-every moment is precious. I've be a in the thicket of roces down by the water. My dress has cought their kisses as I passed; but they are flying, the roses are. They will now be gone."

"And then we must go, too."

"Ah! why can we not live in paralise forever. Why was not this extle built in some clime of propertial summer, near by to the fountain of truth, so that we could sip of its waters, and consider ours lives summer-guests forever—never to be disciplined.—never to come down to breakly them morning, with a shiver, and hear the lord of the castle say—"we must fly! here is the breath of winter blighting us?" Why is happines, Paul, like this role?" and she scattered its leaves at his feet.

Lo king up at him with an air of delicious melancholy, as it size were thinking of the unsatisfactory character of earth, of infinity, and all the sal past and the remote fature of love, of passion, of life, and death, and disting, instead of the thousand a year, a horse keeper, the new fishions and a new coaquit —hooking up at him size saw, grasped convulsively in his hand, that mysterious string of emeral by

It was that, then, she had son him him, then her perjoneplant hind the dispery of her window! A shelow, as if a civil halper love the sky, fill type her. She was carvia 1 that Pennan was in love, or had ben, with some wance unknown to ler. The conjectures upon the subject, when he first came to Lake George, returned to her mind with tre h power. She wit that she had a rivid-but was that rivil the er deal? Dil Pennon mourn for some let leve concipal to an ealy grave? She absorb hop lan; for in that (, in time, she might conside him. While if this myste-I. Sivilwer still alive to as at her claims, she was afrail her then chances as mishes of the castle, were narrow. If Pennalidienamel Noyse's spirit, should have satisful here mi dry by asking him outright about the neckler; but shows attailed Panan, who had a way of keping pople at a distance with a local limit with them to approach him.

"Henry has been could be like these emerdal," she conthree after a research, "impoint the then-" "Then you would never go away hom here?" quarical her companion.

"Not if you would let me stay, lord of the castle," she replied, tempering the full meming of her reply by an appearance of gayety; but a vivid blush broke over her face, at her own bollness, and her glance wavered and sank beneath his grave look.

She was loveller in her confasion, than in her usual culm self-possession. Her fingers tremble has she placked an ther rose to pieces.

"If I could believe you, Resalts, I might invite year to stay with me here and hereafter—for now and for etanity. But I think your ibea receives no farther than an earthly visit—I would choose a companion for this would and the next. I have the unfashionable notions, I have. What if I should present these domains to my thind Dieper, having het halle to ten them myself? I never expect to nearly, at I this calle needs the fairy presents of a would to Characit."

"Oh, Noye: " exclaimed Result, litterly, reduction at Penn his a ration that he is ready to be accept."

"You must for live the media has in one it put a soft in thative. When I see him so puls, so we take I, so the property I pity him, and with him process I of that happines which you, my sweet hely, and you all no, here the process to the process I have known him since we were 'byst gether,' and he is worthy of a women's best love. I recommend process take twice, led re you allow him to go as y from here similarly as he is now."

"Oh! uncle Ped, are you here? I've be a bedden for the let hour!" eried Lulu, beautiful from the read in the read in their direction.

"And what do you want of Uncl. Parl, park?"

"Oh, just to come with me, and he kartie die, all thur and speckled, which Peter has our lit and put allow in the pond."

He to it the little hand held out to him a line so it well namely by the denoine child, healer the period of the entire and entire a healer hand a him to be a him to be a healer to be a CHAPTER IX.

DANGER.

"All is in dress and for the dreams,

"I lay ill, and the dark, hot blood

FL IU'e.

Mr. Paner halt then his despiter Chancis to the Sault So. Marie, in hopes that the cool winds which blow nor as Lake Superior and through the north rungines, would return shaking characteristic affining which had recipel uplant too severe for it.

The terr was almost as a well to the factor as the child; it was a rare thing for one of the inner of the inner of the inner to be away from an ler its red in rethen a might er too for a flying visit to some relative.

Now, the two hall had a loop had a filly were a tarder toward the fill have, has hopeful then when they should be made had been trained and the had a like a fill his ming and he paint siff—but het all the had such as the had a like had a point, had been detailed at the hadren of the had; and was had a like had been detailed and was had a could reach the haven of her mother's arms.

During a place at all the source, the still or south of the angle of the language source in the language of the model of the water, and the speaker of the water, which she love to water, show a cities to a the source of the so

She was awakened by the stopping of the steamer to wood at a little village dock. She was on the side nearest the shere, and as she looked out of the window with sloopy eyes side saw quite a number of passengers and an immense and attend to flaggare, waiting on the wharf to come abourd. They were a distinguished looking party to be gathered tog there at so remote a little village; and with the curiosity of youth Clematis raised her head to reconnoiter them.

Just then one of the gentlemen handed a hely across the plank. She was young, beautiful, and richly dr ssel; and Clematis heard her speaking in a voice silvery sweet:

"Wait, Lulu, Pennon will take care of you."

And then sie saw who this gentleman was who had assisted the lady on to the boat.

She telt too weak and iil to meet him then and there in the proceed all that company; she has with a she will be tray as a tation not be coming to her pride, and she as second sought her state-room with hasty steps, reaching it as the new comers entered the cabin.

Mr. Percy had likewise son Pennon cuter, with main to perceived by him. After the bott was on its way at later late arrivals compatibly with his young friend.

Pennon met him with a glow of supplement place, but not without an agitation he was pain it to see, for he had beard from his daughter's own lips that she had not a labor. They walke look up a dock to have on walk tirled talk.

"How is Mrs. Percy and Clematis?"

"My will we swell when we head him her bet. C.i...'s is with me? Dil you not see her in the coin?"

"No, I did not. I do not think she was the ..."

"She has gone to her state-room, probably, to lie fown. She is hardy that to travel, but I am maximum to get home with her."

"Has she ben ill?-has she recovered her which -what is the matter with her?"

"Thank (i.d., she has never 1 her vit, het-"

"Ay, thank God!" murmured Pennon.

But she has been seed by will simplified put up proght. I have been tracing with by the but her he but the but side has falled instead of gained since we left home. We were detained four days at M—— on account of her illness, and have just started on our way again."

"Heng and yet dread to meet her, Mr. Perey. You know my fieling for her, and that it is in vain. I can not bear to hear that she is suffering. I thought that she looked thinner when I saw her that day in the boat."

"What day can you be speaking of?"

"It is curi may is it not, Mr. Percy?—but we came very near meeting two or three weeks ago. Were you not up an a little i land about twelve miles above here on the third of this month?"

"We were. Our Lat met with a slight accident and was lying several hours for repairs. We were restless at our detection, and hearing of the beauty of the island, several of us like a beat and went over. It was on our way up. We had a delightful excursion."

"We were there within half an hour after you left. Dil your danglater less any thing on the island?"

"I heard her speak of leaving her favorite copy of Bryant on the table in the summer-house."

"I found it and will return it to her. You can gues my surprise at a sing her name on the fly-leaf. While wandering along the shore, I saw some thing sportding in the sunlight. I went to it and found she had lest something of more worth than the peaus—that worlddo necklace with which my formes so in marrically to be mixed. I am glad of this opportunity of restoring it, for it is of value."

"I wish she had lost it in the river where it would never have appeared easin. I confess to the weakness of leginning to feel nervous about that thing."

Penn n smil. I, though rather in similily.

"I must so and she Clematis," said her father. "I will tell I be good part for any on the boat. I believe she will wish to so you. There is no understanding the heart of a women, sin, but it is my hell f-besel in a by upon may own clearvations, and, therefore, not to be depended upon—that she rester a the offer of your head, simply became aske thought her afficient under her to be the fitting companion of such a man."

"Is it possible, Mr. Percy? No, it can a ! 1 !!"

"Mind, I do not say it is. I may be entirely mistaken; and of course I do not intend you to build up he per upon it, if you yet wished it so. I only know that Characis has been another girl since the day you left us. Also I for six 1 ill never to the blooming third she once was I must not inquire after her."

He went after Clematis, and Pennon return little party. "Who was it you were talking with?" a led Really, as let came back to the group.

She seemed jedous alm st of every word and had that others had from him.

"It was a gentlemen with when I am well at a listed. I was glad to meet him," and he religion in the

He knew that the woman by his side the litter fan it it to she loved him, and he had serior by question I within him off whether he ought not to many her and score her happiness and perhaps his own would come in these. Now and make he had had a large fe hag had taken place. They had not sattle of her or life Propagation and backers it Propagation as it.

found her in a high fiver— A line . There is a pipeline on the beat, and we will not rock part with a raise. I think she must have so ny a. Shows joint that a line is and highly excited state when any a with a fact that he is a larger than the protect of play. Indeed, The contract of play. Indeed, The contract of play.

me perticularly to grant her from exit to a "

"Do you think it could have been her supplicated by the What a foolish it a, Mr. Per y. I will you mail by the look at your develor. I am not unsided a political terminal kinds of discases, and have not demand a large will be terminal dangerous diseases. May I go?"

"Most certainly. Mh, I with h ra the rest."

They eat red the state to make the resonant in the land of the lan

Pennon opened the window and door upon the deck, put a wet napkin around her forchead, sent the chambermail for ice—acting with self-posses ion, though evidently alarmal.

"If it should end in inflammation of the brain!" he matterel; "and it will, without great care. The hand of a woman is needed here. This heavy dress must come off immediately."

He went back to Miss Sloane, who was standing in the cabindoor booking off at the fair, green shores.

"Rosalie," said he "I depend up in you as a friend. The woman I love is lying dangerously ill in No. 18. She has no female friend on the boat. Do for her what you can, and you may ask any thing of me hereafter—my gratitude will not know bounds."

"The rem et I ber." The blood rushed into his listener's face, and then returned as quickly. Had she been the weak and utterly selfish woman which her conduct sometimes intimated, she would have failed in the moment of trid.

"I will do all that I can," she said, in a tremulous voice. For an instant she pressed her hand on her heart, unseen by him, and then followed him brayely.

With Mrs. Fencion's help she soon had the unconscious girl relieved of her extra clothing and comfortably attired in her night-dress; had knotted back the bright, entangled curls from her burning brow, held like I water to the thirsting lips, and performed every little act of gentleness which comes ready to a woman's heart and hand.

All that long night three persons sat up with the sick girl. M's Slowe would not leave her charge except for a few monants of rest, when the father and Pennon would take her place. Almost every other instant the cloths about her temples were dipped in its water, and her hands and face continually lathed. If she had been a sister, Roulie could not have been more devoted.

Toward morning the fiver was abated, and the suffer recognized by father. During the night she had called often on his name, and once or twice she had marmured as the name, and ing a thrill of pain through the heart of her faithful watcher.

At daylight the steamer rested from her toils at her dock in the city of D---. Rosalie, and, indeed, her whole party, proposed to go to the same hotel with Mr. Percy and his daughter; and Rosalie declared her intention of remaining by Clematis's side until her mother could be sent for. Her sist r was somewhat astonished by her unusual benevolence, though she and all the others a lmirel it, and felt interested in the youth and beauty of the patient. None knew the secret of Miss Sloane's peculiar kindness but Pennon.

Wrapped in one of Rosalie's elegant morning-gowns, Clematis was borne to a carriage by her father and Pennon, and drawn as quickly as possible to a hotel, where a room had already been ordered and prepared. She had but little fever until afternoon, and then nothing like as violent an attack as on the previous day. With quiet and gool nursing the physician said that the danger of brain fever was averted.

"It will be dull for you and your sister stopping here until Thursby," said Pennon to Rosalie, as they walked to and fro in the public parlors that evening.

" Not very dull," she replied cheerfally. "There must be some dullness and sorrow in every life, and after such a visit to an earthly paradice as we have just enjoyed, it is well to be reminded that there is sickness and trouble in the world."

"Ro-alie, your care may have save! the life of Miss Percy. She may be nothing to me; she has refased to be to me what my heart demanded, but if she were my wife I should fel under no deeper obligations to you. If you ever need a friend, if you have a wish that I can gratify, come to me. You do not know how much you have grown in my reverence and esteem-how much more beautiful your leauty is to mehow much better I understand and appreciate your character than ever before, though you have always been a linited by me. You were like an angel last night, Rosalie! You des rie to be happy. May you always be as brilliant, blooming, and bre-Lovel as now, and may you make the joy of some heart that is worthy of you."

"Ind. I, I have done portions to merit this outbord of praise," answered the bells, but turning up a him cys beaming with a molancholy sweetness strange to them. " It would be an angel of darkness who would not do all possible for the sick. However, I had some thoughts last night rather new to my careless heart, and unless I am too weak to detain them, they may lie there until they spring up, blossom, and bear fruit. Life was not given us merely to idle away—do you think it was, Mr. Pennon?"

He smiled as he looked into her earnest face, more lovely for its unwonted expression of seriousness—smiled at the child-like simplicity with which she propounded the question, as if she had been the originator of it.

"'Life is earnest-life is real, And the grave is not its goal,".

"Longf flow says, Miss Sloane; and it is true, too, though sad, that it is eften only through suffering that we grow strong. Life is any thing but a heliday to the most of us, Rosalie."

CHAPTER X.

ROSALIE CROSSES THE CHASM.

As one thewer with two faces, in hush'd, tearful speech, Like the shewery whespers of thewers, each to each, Link'd, and bearing together, so loving, so fair, So united, yet diverse, the two women there Link'd, indeed, like two flowers upon one drooping stem, In the soft light that tenderly rested on them.

All that soul said to soul in that chamber, who knows?

All that heart gain'd from heart?

Leave the lily, the rose,
Un listurbid, with their secret within them, for who
To the heart of the floweret can follow the dew?

Owen Meredita's Lucille.

"Has the omnibus come up from the boat?"

"Yes; I see it now, just stopping before the hotel."

Realise was peoping from the blinds of the window in Chanatis's room, who was partially sitting up in bed, reclining against a heap of pillows.

"Do you see a lady who looks as if she might be my mother?"

The girl at the window laughed.

"What a question! but, really, there is a lady leaving it that would answer to the description if she were advertised as Clematis Percy's mother. And now I see your father hastening to her—so it must be your mother, and in a moment you will have the pleasure of seeing her."

"Poor mamma! I am sorry they telegraphed to her. What suspense she must have been enduring for the last forty-eight hours."

"Well, now you may know that she is very happy in hearing of your safety and improvement."

"Come here a moment, dear Rosalie."

She went at the summons, and Clematis drew her down to her side, and put her arms about her feek with a kiss.

"I wish to thank you again and again for your sisterly kindness to me—me, a perfect stranger to you, until you came to me in my sickness. Oh, I know my mother will love you!"

The door opened just then and Mrs. Percy, her face covered with mingled smiles and tears, advanced rapidly to the bedside.

"My poor child! Oh, I am so thankful-so rejoiced!"

After the first embrace, Clematis said:

"It was cruel to give you so much anxiety, mamma; but I believe I was pretty seriously ill when they sent for you; and might have been so now if it had not been for this lady, Miss Sloane, mother—my friend, my sister, she allows me to call her."

Rosalie held out her slender white han l. Mrs. Percy in taking it burst into tears, and ended by flinging her arms about her.

" Heaven will bless you, my de ir Mademoiselle."

Rosalie cried a little bit, too, out of nervous sympathy, as well as from a swelling sensation of happiness at heart from hearing herself praised, not for beauty, but for goodness.

"Oh, if they knew what it had cost me, besides a little labor!" she thought, as she brushed away her tears.

Mr. Percy was added to the group who gathered about the bed of the almost recovered invalid. With beaming faces they gaz d upon her cheerful countenance, and conversed almost gayly of past danger. There was another who langed to, yet dared not, join the rest, but was do med to pace restlessly through parlors and halls, his busy thoughts but little diverted by occasional inquiries or remarks from his friend Noyse, who was reading a book by a window.

Noyse was not quite so rollicking as when he left Lake George, and had grown a little thinner; otherwise he seemed contented and tranquil.

Grateful as Mr. Percy felt for the attentions of Miss Sloane to Lis daughter, he could not help smiling at the friendship which had blossomed into full flower so quickly. Men, slow to make up their minds, acting from prudence or reason, and not from impulse, reserved if not cold, self-possessed and conservative, laugh at the sudden and ardent friendships which spring up between women—especially young women, who have not yet grown to lavishing all the wealth of their natures upon husbands and children. They do not understant it, and are apt to think it weak or ridiculous; but, in fact, it is rather admirable. The want of worldly wisdom, of four and suspicion, the gushing out of affection seeking some of jet, the quick sympathy of kindred emotions, the banishment of envy, the confidence, the enthusiasm, are beautiful and becoming to youth and gentleness.

So this new intimacy between the young ladies promised well for their hearts, if not their heads.

After tea the evening passed rapidly away; Rosalie spending the most of it with her friends in their parlor, where the years gentlemen, Lulu, and all, were congregated. Very early, only a little after nine, she bade them good night, and returned to Clematis's room.

Pagey, and I have come to send you away for rest. I must stay with Clematis to-night. She does not need any attention naw; so I will just take this cot-bed so as to be within call if she should chance to want any thing, and shall sleep just as nicely as if I were in my own room. You must make no objections, for to-merrow I go away, and this is my last night, you know."

So they I it the sweet persuader to have her own way.

"Do you feel like sleeping, or are you feverish to night, darling?"

"C-l and composed, and comfortable as can be," replied Clematis.

"Quite a combination of the c's. Well, then, I will just put up my hair and slip on my dressing-gown, and then I shall be still as a mouse, and you can slumber undi-turbed."

"'Your gentle limbs you will undress, And lay down in your loveliness."

"Do not try to make a Christabel out of me, love; rather give me the part of the lady she entertained. What, if in looking at me you should suddenly detect the serpent eyes? Are you not almost afraid to let me sleep so near you tonight?"

"Oh, do not speak so, if you please."

"I will not, since I see it makes your flesh creep. I am a naughty nurse; I shall be getting you feverish again. So lie still, and good night, my dear."

"Good night, Rosalie."

There was no sound in the chamber for a time, but the soft rustling of Rosalie's silk dress, as she stood by the mirror removing the ornaments from arms and bosom, putting the bright tresses of her hair back from her pearly ears and knotting it up behind, and looking into the reflection of her own eyes, as if seeking there the answer to an enigma.

By-and-by she extinguished the lights and opened the blinds. The moon was at the full, and a soft luster haloed her form as she sat by the window, looking out over the city to a glimpse of water sparkling where the river bounded the town. It was earlier than she usually retired, and she sat a long time, busy with her heart and its destinies.

It was not often that she took so calm and exquisite an hour for meditation; but of late a change had been coming over her moods of action and thought.

The city clock struck for milnight while she sat as if entrance l in a fairy ring of moonlight.

"Resalie, dear, you certainly ought to come to be l. You will take cold."

"Bless me, Clematis, I thought you were asleep hours ago."

"I was asleep a little while, I gwss. But I do not feel sleepy now. I keep thinking about Christabel."

"That you must not do, until you are less excitable than now. May I come and lie down by your side? I want to this to you and make you think of something else, or you will have a fever-dream and deem yourself bewitched."

She crossed the floor and stole into bed with Clematis.

"I would like you to tell me, if you have no objection, why you refused Pennon's hand?"

Chmatis gave a little start, and nestled her cheek deeper into the pillow.

" Who told you?" she asked, in a low voice.

"He did. If ever a man loved woman, he loves you. I can not conceive how you could slight such love from such a man, unless you were previously pledged to another."

"To another? No, no! He does not think so, does he?"

"I do not know what he thinks; but I can see that he is wretched. You cast a jewel of the richest price away when you discarded him, Clematis."

The young girl was trembling as she flung her arm over Raille.

"I love him-better than life!" she said. "Do you think he cares for me still?"

"His books and his conduct betray it. If you loved him, why did you send him away from you?"

"Dil he not tell you the circumstances of his visit to our h visa, and of the accident which befel me?"

"He told me nothing of any particulars. I should like to her them, for I am deeply interested in both of you. I part from you to-morrow, and we may not meet for a long time."

With her arms about her listener's waist, and her warm check very close to hers, Clematis told, in a softened, translate voice the little history of Pennon's stay with them.

When he came to me, the day after I was stricken,—I had a no lown-stairs and was lying upon the soft in the parlor, trying to think estaily of my misfortune, and to reconcile my mind to the probable consequences,—and made me the offer of love which he did, my first feeling was one of such overwhelming happiness that I entirely forgot my affliction. But when I essayed to speak, then it was forced upon me—and with it the thought of my selfishness in accepting his proffered hand under such circumstances.

may think so now, when noble pity prompts him to believe that he loves me; but he is proud, and a man of the world. He will not like to introduce a mute wife—'"

"There is where you did him injustice, Clematis. He would be proud to prove, in such a loyal way, his devotion to purity and gentleness."

"It was because I loved him so much that I could not bear to purchase my own happiness at the peril of his. I was afraid that I could not be to him the wife that he ought to have; and so I turned away from his offer, while my heart was breaking with its double trouble—not that I felt the loss of my voice as I did of his love. After he left me, I scarcely thought or cared for that, except that it had been the means of parting me from him. O Rosalie! he must see that I have suffered. It has nearly cost me my life."

"And all for a foolish scruple. Unless he had the key to your actions, how could be see in your present illness any connection with your refusal of him? Why did you not write and recall him after the physicians restored your powers of speech ?

"Because I did not know where he was; and I thought—I thought that he had gone away so readily, and never gave me any chance to retract, that perhaps he had discovered that he was mistaken in his sentiments."

"Oh, you little infidel! Pennon would not leg a lady's love. He has so lofty an ideal, he thinks where there is real union of souls, that the woman will feel it as certainly as the man, and not compel him to be seech her forever."

"I did not think there might be. But I had seen so little of the world, and was so-so-"

"Such a timid, self-mistrusting little thing. Now, what if you had lost a lover from want of appreciating your own qualities."

Well, I do wonder, even yet, how it is possible that he does not prefer you. You are so queenly; you look so well by his side. Oh, do you know I thought you were his bride when you came on to the boat that day?"

- "And so you fell into a fever of despair, which came near being fat d. Pennon love me? Why, you foolish child, I am the last woman he would think of choosing; so do not be jed as of me. I could have told that you would be his ideal, if I had seen you in a crowd. It is you who have the face and voice for him."
 - "Are you save he loves me, Rosalie?"
- "If he could hear that quiver in your words just as I heard it, and feel your little heart leap up thus wildly as I feel it, do you not think he would be insane with rapture? I am quite some he loves you; and to pay myself for telling you, I am going to exact a promise from you."
 - " What is it?"
- "That I shall be your bridemaid. There, your blushes are fairly burning the pillow, or else your fever is returning. So god night, again, darling. Sleep sweet, and be happy."

"I am happy. Good night, Rosalie."

CHAPTER XI.

THE FATALITY DISCOVERED.

"So gracious were its portals wide,
So light and fair the turrets stood,
No tlaw mine eager eye espied,
I fashion'd it, and call'd it good;
And lavish'd on its solitude,
All garnishings of pomp and pride.

That was in golden summer-time;—
The winter wind is howling now,
My palace has pass'd out of time,—
The sward is only sheeted snow,
Its hangings with the dead leaves blow.

ROSE . ARRY.

Rosalie arose, the morning after the confession she had won from Clematis, very happy with a purpose which she had in her heart. She could hardly wait for the breakfast-hour which would summon the party together; as immediately after, she intended to impart to Pennon the delightful information she had for him, and thus put an end to the foolish and unnecessary misery of a couple of sentimental young people who seemed trying to misunderstand each other.

But when the breakfast hour had come, Pennon came not. Noyse informed her that his friend had left, on an early train, for the east, being summoned by unexpected business, and had left his farewells for the party to be impartially distributed by himself.

"I am afraid he is troubled about money-matters," remarked Noyse, "he has seemed so moody and restless the last few days; and now his sudden departure seems to argue some difficulty. Artists and poets are always in financial trouble."

"Financial trouble!" cried Rosalie, scornfully. "He has made a fool of himself, as usual !"

"I must say, I am astonished to hear you finding fault with that impersonation of perfection,"—and Noyse looked at her curiously; "am I to attribute this sudden outburst to mortified vanity, at his having deserted you so abruptly?"

"No, Mr. Noyse, my vanity is not in the least hurt," answere i she, looking at him without anger. "Paul Pennon has no lenger the power to mortify me, by slighting me, though, I confess, I should like to have his good opinion, and would be proud of his esteem. Haven't your sharp eyes pencify I the mystery yet? So promising a lawyer as yourself ought to have unwound the thread of the little romance played before your very eyes."

"You don't say so!" and the gentleman looked as if he were now beginning to unwind the thread.

"Yes, I do say so. I know all about it. That young creature up stairs made me her mother-confessor last night; she loves that fly-away hero, but not any more devoutly than he does her. And here, just as I am commissioned to bear a message, as rich with sweets as a bee with honey, expecting to reap the reward which comes from such good actions, behalf, the coward has fled. Financial troubles, indeed! I should have painted his free with a glow of everlasting sunshine, if the had waited for my tidings. And now, I suppose, the patient will be having her fever back again, and every thing is at cross-purposes. How tantalizing?"

Pennon had indeed acted like a coward, although a braver nature than his could not be found in an army of heroes. That extreme sensitiveness which belongs to persons of his temperament, and which certainly amounts sometimes to a positive dellet, and of which good sense, after a sufficient experience, will sometim s get the mastery, had prevented his making the attempt to assertain if the illness of Clematis had any thing to do with her ficking for him. Besides, he had too intense an interest in her welfaresto allow himself to risk her returning health by any agitating disclosures; he did intend to try his Littagin when she should be considered convalescent; but the evening previous to his abrupt departure, he had received a letter from his housekeeper at the castle, announcing that an accident had happened to the steward of the place, who halfall numl injured himself. There was no necessity for his a ing to see about it, but as he wanted something to occupy his restless mind, he set out on a solitary return to his home, allowing Noyse to infer that he was hurrying on to New York.

Curiously enough Pennon took with him the Emerald Necklace. It was entirely by accident that he did so. He had intended to give it into Mrs. Percy's hands to return to her daughter; and had placed it in a small box and set it on his toilet-table, that he might not forget to do so. The lox which he had converted into an impromptu jewel-casket, we are obliged to confess, had once contained tooth-powder; and had been fished for the occasion out of the depths of Pennon's trunk. When he came to leave so hastily, the whereabouts of the jewels disappeared from his memory, the tooth-powder was packed up—and it was not until making his toilet, the morning after his arrival at the castle, that he was surprised by the wierd, unnatural gems flashing at him, as wicked eyes will cometimes thish, in place of the harmless dentifice into which the brush was ready to descend.

At that moment those magnificent emerilds looked to him like the living eyes of scrpents, and he returned the cover to the box flastily and with nervous trepidation. It was the first time he had ever perceived any thing ominous about them; hitherto they had appeared to him invested with that tender charm given them by the fact of Clematis having worn them about her throat; but now there was something baleful in their green light. A sudden shadow fell upon the cheerful chamber.

When he descended to the solitary breakfast, prepared and served with faultless skill by the housekeeper, snatches of old stories and legen is kept humming through his head, as hernets will hum in chambers from which they ought to be bunished—uply traditions, all of which had an odor of witcherms or poisoning about them—of the old Italian eras of treachery and assassination—of the French and English era of love-philters and poisoning—of hidous hags and withered magicians.

In the rich around of his cup of coffee he detected the flavor of a love-philter; in the cream-gravy of the flavor chicken was a lunking savor of some subtle pois an; the flathful and innocent housekeeper, as she came in with a plate of het relie, appeared to him a wrinkled beldam, conspired with spirits for his destruction. Some glamour was over his eyes; he rubbed them, arose, looked at his watch, and took up the morning paper.

"You've not much appetite this mornin', Mr. Pennon."

"Not much; but it will increase, I assure you. The fault, certainly, is not in your cooking. Before I go away, you will have no reason to complain."

"It was very thoughtful of you, comin' because of the steward's hurting himself. Will you stop long this time, sir?"

"I hardly know. A week I shall stay, at all events. The gardens are full of gorgeous flowers; every thing is very beautiful here still; and I do not see why I should not stay. I believe I will set up my easel in the picture-gallery and paint something. I feel just like it."

"I trust you'll conclude to do so, Mr. Pennon. It seems a great pity to have nobody here but me and the steward and the chere-boy, and all this great place lookin' so splendid. The old master used to think the full of the year the best part of it here. He was mighty fond of the forests when they were all turned a-yellow, and of pickin' up the autumn leaves—he liked the dahlias and crysanthemums, and all the fall flowers, sir. My! but he was a man of taste,—and I think you take after him, sir, by your ways. You've minded me of him many times. So you paint pictures, do you? Well said! I'll like to see semething you do, sir; and the longer the master is at home, the better we'll all like it. I'm sorry you couldn't ext no more breakfast, Mr. Pennon."

He thanked her for her interest, and strolled out of the let citiester em into the garden upon which it opened. The September san was still warm enough for out-door sitting, and let throw hims if upon a seat, where the silver flash of a fint that the peper in his hand, but he did not read. A civily a spacer same last foreign to the scene as a modern about ment would be, pasted across the forehead of the Egyption Sphing. There was a witchery in the soft, yellow sunstills which wove about him like a cobweb. The present to the first and place. It would not have surprised him to have a considered as a flower of the Albamba.

and that he was thousands of years older still than that, and was eating opium in some eastern garden of roses-a garden however, in which occasional serpents struck out their pangs from the folinge of the choicest roses. He felt as if danger menaced him, and yet as if a fatal indolence oppresse! hima delicious languor against which it was in vain to struggle. Thus, for a couple of hours, he reclined on the rustic bench, staring at the golden flowers and silver fountain. Then, with an effort, he stretched himself, arose, walked twice or thrice rapidly up and down the walk, and seating himself again, called himself back to the present reality of things, by a glance at the news-items of his paper. He read the market report as staidly as a produce-merchant; and ascertained, to his great enlightenment, that iron was firm, and lead was heavy, that cheese was inactive, and hogs were dull; that flour was rising, and heps were active, that milch-cows were steady, and calves were depressed, that pigs were falling, and lard was irregular. Having attempted to digest these interesting items, his eye glanced over into another column, where it fell upon a curious statement of a recent occurrence in Paris, which had, at that hour and time, a powerful fa-cination for Pennon. The extract read thus:

"All visitors to Paris will have noticed the shops of brit-abrue, or objects of curiosity and rertu, so numerous and tempting in that capital. At one of these establishments, in the rue St. Honore, a gentleman was engaged a few days ego, in examining an ancient ring for sale there, when he accidentally gave bimself a slight scratch in the hand with a sharp part of it. He continued talking with the dealer for a short time when he felt an indescribable numbness and torpor taking possession of his faculties, and soon became so ill that the people of the shop hastened to call in a physician. The doctor immediately declared that the gentleman had ben poisoned by some mineral substance, applied strong antilotes, and was fortunate enough to relieve the symptoms which had created so much alarm. The ring was then examined by the medical man, who had spent some time in Venice, and who found that this old jewel was what is there called a "Death ring," a class of ornaments in frequent use in Italy during the seventeenth century, when the habit of poisoning was almost universal. Attached to the part of the ring intended to be wern inside the finger were two minute lion's claws, of the sharpest steel, and having elefts in them filled with a violent pois n. In a ball or other crowded assembly, the wearer of this fitted ring, wishing to exercise revenge on any one present, would take the victim's hand, and when pressing it, ever so gontly, the sharp claw would be sure to inflict a slight seritch on the skin, and the victim would be equally sure to led all before the next morning. Notwithstanding the length of time which must have clapsed since the poison was secretal in the ring in question, it was still powerful enough to cause great danger, as has been seen, to the gentleman who had so unwarily touched it."

At the moment hacers I reading this statement, a flash of a sate pain, shorp and sallen as lightning, spread from Penna's hand over his body. Upon the first finger of his left hand, a small red spot because inflame and swell—he examined it closely; it seemed to have been punctured, either by some shorp metal, or by the sting of an insect.

"Pshaw! it is the bite of a spider, or the sting of a bee," he matter 1; but as the pain intermitted, only to increase, and be current ting, he felt alarmed.

"Calford that no blace! there's something about the closp of it that's not right," he exclaimed. "I remember stratching mys if with it when I lined it out of the box this no raise. It shou't be the death of me, however, if there's any virus in the power of saction,"—and applying his lips to the we in I, he extracted as much as possible of whatever plied it contained. Then, going to the kitchen, he had the here he provable of scraped castile-soap.

"No we note I felt and acted so strangely, this morning," he the ught, "it was this rayst rious poison working in my veins. I'll to an I take some of my electrate, and so if I cannot some all the spell. Great heavenst is it not terrible to think Clouds has been weating that "Let I bouble! I do not believe the lightning struck her at all. I believe it was the behaved ing inchange of this poison, weakened by its long repose in the water. It is so fortunate that I did not restore it to her mether had re I made this discovery."

Having taken some of the clirir which he took from a tiny gold vial in his medicine chest, and the pain in his arm having somewhat abated, he set about an examination of the necklace. After what had occurred, he was not very much surprised to find a minute steel claw, similar to the one spoken of as being upon the old Venetian ring, upon the under side of the clasp of the antique necklace. It was so small, and so cunningly disposed beneath the filagree work of the clasp, that it would pass unobserved by any one not purposely searching for it. The curse which that incarnate demon of revenge, Mortimer Monteath, had bein upon the necklace, had been of a very practical character no doubt, the sudden death of the bride to whom he presented it, ages ago, was caused by the silent fangs of this hidden enemy. Although, by Mrs. Percy's account, several of her fair ancestors had met their deaths by accidents for which the jewels could in no way be made accountable, there were several who must have perished by this fatal means. The claw was arranged so that a wound would not, of necessity, be the result of wearing the emeralds, but would be very likely to be inflicted, sooner or later.

Pennon seized a pair of forceps from his dressing-case, and was about to wrench the dangerous clasp from the jewel; but, upon second thought, resolved to leave it as it was, until he had an opportunity of exhibiting to Mrs. Percy the deally secret of the ancestral gems, and returning them to her, freed from the ancestral curse. So he returned them again to their box, which he put away securely and locked up in a drawer of his bureau, for further safety.

His arm still remained too painful to permit him to think of painting, although the pain was subsiding, and he perceived no dangerous symptoms. The day was one of glorious freshness and brilliancy, and he spent the afternoon wandering over his estate, enjoying its solitude and beauty.

"If Clematis were here!" was the perpetual cry of his heart.

He little dreamed of the consequences of his rash flight to her. He had feared to agitate her by seeking her presence in her sick-room, yet the timidity of his love had forbidden him to dread a far more fatal agitation as the result of his desertion of his party.

When he came in to a late supper, which took the place of his neglected dinner to him, he suffered but little inconvenience from his wound, and partook, with gratifying relish, of the good housekeeper's dainties.

He retired to his room, full of those delightful dreams of youth, in which the inspirations of genius and the glow of pession are mingled—slept soundly—and arose to work.

Yes! he was going to paint a picture. His subject was chesen, his hearl, heart, and soul, ready for the work. He went first to the gallery, which had a skylight; but decided that he like I his own pleasant chamber best, and transferred his easel to that. Before the ruddy blushes of dawn had melte I into the full splendor of day, his materials were prepared. The summons to breakfast interrupted him in outlining his picture upon a canvas ready prepared. He partock of a light repast, just enough to invigorate the body without stapelying the mind, and returned to his task with all the ardor which his subject inspired. It was not the fair seems which lay stretched out before his window which he sketched—it was to him the embodiment of all beauty in a woman's shape—a portrait of Clematis.

How lang he had labered he did not know; his hand s - med in-pired, and wrought of itself the happiest effectsc i is as lovely as he had ever imagined seemed to combine of themselves upon his pallet and transfuse themselves into the beloved countenance which began to smile upon him from the curves. Hours or moments, he could not tell which, flicted by; looking up, by the merest chance, in a moment of dreamy abstraction, there, in a chair which stood a short distance from him, sat Clematis herself. She had taken the positi n of the portrait, its expression, its dress, and was smiling into his eyes with a look of love, so deep, so soft and still-it was like looking into heaven to gaze into those eyes. For several seconds neither of them stirred, the love which he saw so plainly in her lock was to Pennon such a surprise and joy, that i'r the time being, he forgot to wonder how she came to Le sitting for her portrait there, in his room.

"Clematis!"

He almost whispered her name, in accents touched by his overpowering fedings, but gently as he spoke, his voice alarmed her. She arose from the chair and glided toward the door.

"Stay! stay, I implore you! only a moment until I speak to you!"

She had reached the door, and turning at his cry, smiled upon him with a strange sadness in her smile, and glided out, silent as a phantom. Perhaps it was a phantom! Pennon sprang to his feet and rushed to the door. He caught sight of a shadowy form descending the broad staircase, he heard the faint rustle of a woman's silken garments, and she was gone. He followed down into the hall, but no one was there; he hurried out upon the avenue,—no one was in sight; he wandered in every direction but saw no footprint, nor any trace of a visitor. He stepped into the housekeeper's department and asked her it she had admitted any one to the house, or seen any one walking in the grounds.

"No,-not a living soul. Was there robbers about, or what?"

"No robbers. I thought I saw one of my friends in the hall."

She looked at him curiously, for his manner was of a kind to attract attention; he observed it, and tried to appear more natural. After a useless search, he returned to his room and sat down before his easel; but the power to work well had vanished, and he could not recall if. "It was her!—and—no, it was not her—what a fool I am! it was an illusion, of course—yet I am sure it was her,"—thus did he contrallet himself.

Reason and common-sense forbade him to believe that Clematis Percy had actually been in his room; yet those very senses, whose evidence we are wont to accept as conclusive, assured him that she had. He had never seemed to himself to be in a freer, happigr, healthier state of mind and body—there was not a single pang left in his wounded finger—he was not a man given to superstitions, and he had never had trances nor walked in his sleep, nor exhibited any tendency toward any extraordinary or phenom—had powers. In vain he took up his brushes—every touch which he gave the picture disfigured it; he saw that he must wait until the spirit moved. He walked about his room, he looked out of the win low, he took up a new volume and began to read.

Suddenly the thought came to him that Clematis was dead. He felt cold and faint—as chilled to the heart as if he had touched the marble forehead of a corpse. If that were really she who came to him, then Clematis was not dead, for that which he had seen was not a spirit nor an angel—not a holy and beatified spirit—but a woman, pure and sacred as earth can be, but warm, loving, full of the tenderness and sympathy of this world.

Of course it was all in vain that he tormented himself to explain a mystery to which he had no clue. It was midnight before he could compose himself to sleep; but when he did slumb r, his rest was profound and dreamless. He awoke with the same elation of spirits which had distinguished his rising the previous day. He felt so impelled to proceed with the portrait, that he resumed his work immediately after the morning meal.

This time he felt no surprise when, having hardly get satisfactorily at his work, raising his eyes, he beheld Clematis again in the chair. Indeed, he had placed the chair for her, feeling sure that she would return. He greeted her with a silent smile, which she returned in kind. She was looking lovely, her checks tinged with faint blushes, her hair falling our lessly about her face and throat, her white dress floating at out her like a light cloud. In her bosom she were a rose and a sprig of myrtle, and a band of plain gold circled either arm.

Pennon was so afraid she would dissolve into air if he spike to her, that he said not a word, looking alternately at the sitter and the curves, and working rapidly and with delight. At length he spoke, without thinking of the probable consequences—

"Turn your head a little this way, Clematis."

She cheyed him, without speaking, her eyes seeming to ask if it was right.

"Yes, that is it, precisely;" painting diligently, but ventualize to ask, after a pause—"how came you here, Clematis?"

Have was no alswer; she looked at him gravely, but made no sign of having heard the question. For half an hour he worked on; then threw down his pallet and brushes, exclaiming—

"Speak to me, dear Clematis, I beg of you. Your silence is so hard to bear. If you are really she whom I love, allow me to tell you again"—but she had vanished,—his cloquence relapsed into dreamy silence.

For several days this bewildering experience was continued. Every morning Pennon painted upon the portrait—every morning his sitter came to him, obeyed his instructions, smiled upon him, looked happy, but never spoke; and whenever he attempted to approach her, or implored her to explain to him the mystery of Ler going and coming, she arose and left him. She always went out by the door and down the stairs like any ordinary mortal, but after she had reached the avecue he could trace her no farther. Once, indeed, he had followed her down to the river-bank; but there she had turned an l made a gesture, imploring him to follow her no farther, and he had turned back at her bidling. Pennon was half distracted by this tantalizing phantom—if phantom it were sometimes fearing that his mind was affected, yet if it were, he had never worked so well when he was sane. The portrait was a masterpiece of art, astonishing in the exquisite beauty of its coloring and the impassioned life of its expression—it was all that a portrait could be.

It was finished at last; Pennon could invent no further excuse for another touch. He was wretched at the thought, for he felt assured that he should see no more of Clematis. And, strange as it may seem, he had grown so infatuated with her silent beauty, her quiet presence in his chamber, smiling, radiant, delicately robed, that he loved her better thus than ever before. Prequently came back to his mind memories of that thee when he had sat in the old-tashioned parlor of her father's house, painting, listening to her voice, recarding her household ways, and learning to love her. He had been enchanted then, but he was enthralled now. He had many strange funcies about her visits. At times he imagined that she was playing some pretty trick upon him, and he would humor her whim in it; again, that paralysis of her powers of speech had returned upon her, and that she had come to allow him to obtain her image, and then was going away to hills hers if from him forever; then again, all these theories would appear so alourd that he laughed at himself. Yet laugh as he would, the first or there. Dither Clematis Perey actually came to his room each day, coming in at the door and passing out of it, like any other mortal, and sat to him for her pitture; or else he was the victim of a strange mental debasi u—an halfacination of which he had never before had the slightest symptoms. How could be persuade himself that the young girl sitting there—a palpable, blushing, breathing presence—was only a chimera of his own brain.

"If I might that her-even the folds of her dress!" he marriagred, but some power withheld him-the fear of startling her, perhaps handshing her to return no more.

He might, of course, have called in the housekeeper, to sit in his room, during the morning, and decide by her testimony which rethers was or was not a third person in the room; had to this he had two objections—the first that he respected the shrinking delicacy of his sitter, and the other, that if he was thus decived and mentally astray, he was too proud to allow an thera knowledge of his weakness.

Like many other scholers, whose active minds reach out in every direction. Paul Pean on had read a great many medical Looks, and of course had myle anatomy a study in the course of his profession as figure-pointer. He was not unaware that hold blocking more remarkable than this, had occurred, and that they were generally symptoms of insanity. But there was no insanity here livery in his family, and he was at that time in excellent leadth, not feverish, and with no symptoms of or indexcitem nt. Others may have been victims of the indications,—but he was not,—he was convinced of that these questions forced themselves upon his mind, to be driven back unanswered by the might of his love and the sweetness of his content in the present. For, after the morning sitting, although he could paint no more after she left the room, yet he felt peaceful and happy, spending the rest of the day in the gardens or on the river, and the evening in reading and pleasant musing.

He file his pilse, looked at his tonome in the mirror, questional his mind coolly, and was convinced. His only trouble was in fixing up a simple accorded motives for the actions of the young girl. He had belt her with her purents, on her the young girl. He had belt her with her purents, on her the young girl. What should have caused her to way him? wasting a sufficient convalence to enable her to way him? What should have caused her to desert resume the journey. What should have caused her to desert the name of the him?—where she kept herself when away then him?—lor object in a ming to him in this manner?—all

The day before the picture was finished, a thought had occurred to him which had made him very uneasy—the idea that Clematis might have been seized with brain-fever and wandered away from friends in a state of partial insanity. If so, what danger must she not be in, and from what terrible suspense must they be suffering!

He scrutinized her closely when she came for the last time. There was no appearance of fever or unnatural excitement; she was calm, gentle, her eyes serene, and her cheeks just tinted with the roses of health.

CHAPTER XII.

A PHANTOM BRIDE.

Almost translucent with the light divine
Of her within; the prow and stern did curl
Horné l'on high, like the young moon supine.

Morn, noon, and even, that boat of pearl outran
The streams which here it, like the agrowy cloud,
Or tompast, or the speedler thought of man,
Which fleeth forth and can not make abode.
And ever, as we sail'd, our minds were full
Of love and wisdom, which would overflow
In converse wild and sweet and wonderful,
And in quick shales whose light would come and go."
SHELLEY.

As we have said before, there soon came a day when the picture was finished. When that last touch was given which ren lers all further touches desceration, Pennon looked up with a yearning, regretful look into the eyes of Clematis. She saw from his expression that the portrait was completed, and arose.

"Will you not look at it?" he asked; but she shook her head and glided toward the door; moved by an uncontrollative impulse, he stretched out his hands supplicatingly, but she shock her head again, opened the door and flitted through, pausing a brief instant to give him a farewell glance. He felt that she would return no more, and was resolved to end all this mystery at once, if possible, by following her.

Passing into the hall, he saw her descending the stairs, and pursued her out into the avenue, through the catalpa-grove, the rece-garden, over the lawn, into a thicket of laurels, and from the need into the grotto which formed his boat-house. He was surprised to find her so familiar with all the labyrinths of the grotto. She never once looked around, but glided on with the noiseless step of a spirit. When he reached the grotto, she was just stepping into a little boat which he had never seen before, but which shamed the white crimson and gold of his own pretty bark. It looked more like a "curved shell of hollow pearl" than any thing else. Without looking behind her, the young girl took up a slender our, elegantly fashioned and silvered over, with which she paddled out into the broad sunlight of the river. So swift were her motions that Pennon had difficulty in keeping her in sight, while he detached his boat from its moorings, took down a pair of cars, and pushed out into the river. There was hardly wind enough to make the single sail of his boat available, so he left it furled and urged the oars to the bent of his power. He made tremendous strokes, but with an ease transcending his usual skill, and was soon so close to the fair fugitive that he shouted to her to wait for him. His shouts were unheeded-the pearly boat, with its white-robed occupant, flew along the sparkling river as we dream of the barks of Paradise sailing on the eternal streams. Pennon wondered that the rough men in the river craft, whom they met, did not turn and stare at the beautiful vision which flitted by them; but they hardly cast a glance at the girl, earing more to gaze stupidly at the crimson and gilding of his boat, and the sturdy speed with which he pulled the oars.

Clematis had taken the direction of the island, upon which, not many weeks previous, she had lost her book and necklace. It looked lovelier than ever as they approached it this day. The leaves of the trees, some of them just tinged with the first light frost, fluttered in the tremulous breeze like so many restless birds. The belt of sand upon the shore, lay in the rich atmosphere like a girdle of gold, dropped about the island to protect its beauty. Springing upon land the moment the keel of her shallop grazed the sand, Clematis turned for the first time, beckoned Pennon to follow her, and took the path to the summer-house. He had an occasional glimpse of her figure amidst the trees, as he hurried after her. When he reached the pagoda, she was standing in the entrance. He now perceived that she had added a wreath of orange-flowers and a vail to her attire. The long, full vail floated about her ethereal form, waved by the almost imperceptible wind.

"I am ready, Paul," she said, speaking for the first time in all the six days she had been with him.

She took his hand and led him into the pagoda. A venerable of I man stood by the table, on which was a vase of flowers and a book—a prayer-book open at the marriage rituel. Up a the entrance of the young couple, he began the ceremony, and in a brief time further, Pennon and Clematis were man and wife.

The cll man blessed them, as they knelt before him, and vanished.

"Come, my darling, let us go home."

"Yes, let us hasten, before storms arise!" cried the bride.

The two wan bred, hand in hand, down to the shore, until they came to where their boats were meered.

"One bout will suffice for both," said Pennon.

Yes! let us take mine. It is the swiftest, and danger threatens. Do you not see the tempest coming, Paul?"

A shelow had come suddenly between them and the sunshine. For the first time the brilegroom perceived gathering cloths blackening the west, and sending ar interpreters scudding along the sky; the silver sparkle of the waves was lost in an ominous leaden had, and an oppressive stillness, for a short space, rested upon all things.

"Yes, desirest, let us hasten;" and Pennon sprang, by mistake, into his own boot, litting his bride with him. "Ah! this is my loct. Never min!—we will fly before the wind; let me unitri the sail."

The sail was spread, and the first light breezes of the coming storm filled it and carried the bark along pleasantly. But son the wind arose forcely and the black water dashed over into the boot, wetting the white drapery of the bride. She shivered with the cold.

in filter n minutes. The tempest will not break before that."

On and on they flew, rapidly as the wind which bore them; the en minutes—half an hour—an hour passed, and the castle did not come in sight.

"It is strange!" muttered the bridegroom, beginning to feel deep at rm, as he broked at his pale and silent companion.

"Yes, it is strange. Shall we never reach home, Paul?"

"Have course we must soon be there."

The funciful penmant which flew left re the mast was rent in tatters, the sail was close-reefed, and the little vessel labored in the sullen waters; lightning flashed overhead; the sun set and night came on, with darkness which only the bolts of heaven could rend asunder.

"Oh, where is our home?" cried Clematis.

"I know not,-but at least we can die together!"

He reached forth in the darkness and gathered her shivering form to his bosom—that moment the vessel struck a rock and was dashed in pieces; the chilly waters rushed over them—they sank—sank.

"It's a dreadful mercy, doctor, that he wasn't drowned."

"He was about as near dead as men ever get to be who are fited to try life a little longer."

"I've heard him say he was an excellent sailor, and I don't see how he came to let his boat run agin a snag in broad day-light. If them fishermen hadn't been close to hand, he'd never have been rescued."

"Keep him warm, and give him plenty of stimulating drink.
I'll call in to-morrow again; he's doing well enough now.

How do you feel, Mr. Pennon?"

"Very comfortable, thank you; though I can hardly be certain how I do feel," answered the patient, opening his eyes and looking about him. "Say, doctor, was she saved?"

"Who?" asked the physician, in surprise.

"My wife,-the lady who was in the boat with me."

The doctor and housekeeper exchanged glances, as much as to say that he was not in his right mind. "Perhaps he was wounded upon the head by the boat or snag;" and he began to examine the head of the patient beneath the hair.

"No-let me alone, my head is all right. Perhaps I have been dreaming. How came I in this condition and what has happened to me?"

"You were out, alone in your boat, sailing on the river, when you ran into a sneg, upset your boat, and you sink, being either unable to swim, or having received a blow which stunned you. Some fishermen near at hand, dragged you out and brought you home, when your housekeeper summoned me. We had hard work to bring you back to life, Mr. Pennon."

"What day of the week is it, and what hour of the day?"

"It is about six o'clock of Wednesday, P. M."

"Only four hours since I left this house," murmure I Pennon,—"it was all an hallucination then. Doctor, I want to talk with you to-morrow, when you call."

The next day, Pennon and the physician had a long conversation, at nearly the close of which the former exclaimed:

"Confound that tragic necklace! it was that, after all!"

"I am convinced that it was!"

"You think it possible that a poison, once violent enough to produce instant death; then, when weakened by age, paralysis; might, on some constitutions, produce such effects as I have suffered from the past week?"

- "I do. It has acted upon you something as opium or lastest might. Your housekeeper avers that you have believed 'curiously' all the time. Moreover, I must infer, since the young lady of whom you speak was so palpable and persistent a part of your visions, that she had previously been very much in your thoughts"—and the doctor smiled. Pennon smiled also, and his color heightened.
 - "You are not mistaken," he answered frankly.

"I should like to see the necklace,—it must be a curi-, osity."

"You shall,—and the portrait which I painted, also—that is, if I really printed over I have not been in my chamber yet, the housekeeper forbade my leaving this room until you gave orders."

"It will do you no harm to stir about a little now. I could hardly tear myself from the house until I knew whether you actually worked during your extraordinary illusion, or only fancied your labors."

The two gentlemen went together to the chamber.

"It seems to me almost as if the perfume of her garments lingered here," murmured Pennon, stepping in, as if the place were sacred.

The chair which the imaginary sitter had occupied stood in its proper place, the easel, which was turned toward the light, the pallet, just as he had hastily set down, was there, the paints dried on; they advanced eagerly to the front of the canvas.

"Good heavens! I don't think you need to regret being poisoned, if this is the result of it?" exclaimed the doc-

Pennon stood spell-bound before his own supremely beautiful work.

"It is herself!" he whispered.

"Then go and ask her to marry you,—you can never hope to do better, I tell you. I don't wonder you had visions."

The young man laughed at the staid doctor's enthusiasm;

but he was not all displeased by it.

"The picture would make you famous, as a work of art. And then, what a subject! If I was not a married man and the father of a family, I should start off in search of the original, and try to cut you out."

"I didn't know but I shall imitate Praxitales, and adore my own work." .

"Ah, but Praxitales had no original to a lore. That's the difference, my boy. There's a more sensible plan before you."

"And do you think I am to feel no further effects from the scratch of the steel claw, doctor?—hold! I will show you the emeralds."

"I think not, at present," was the answer, while Pennon unlocked a drawer and drew forth a box. "Your cold bath, and the start your system has received, will shake off all effects, especially if you seek change and travel for a short time. At this time of the year, another season, you may have a slight recurrence of your malody; but you and your friends will understand it, and know how to humor it. Your constitution is excellent, and you will suffer no especial harm."

The physician handled the emeralds as he would have done a serpent from which he wished to extract the fangs.

"They are superb," said he, "quite a treasure. You had better allow me to wrench out this dangerous claw, before some one else is harmed by it."

"I had rather not, until the owners have seen it. I will be careful that no one shall handle it;" and the necklaer was replaced.

"I can not persuade myself that all this has not been a reality."

"I have read of more remarkable instances of hallucination," permit at his case. "Indeed, I have made brain disorders a straly. Such illusions as you have labored under, are very common in cases of insanity, when beginning to develop, but are also produced by other causes, as for instance, some kinds of drugs and poisons, whose effects are principally upon the brain. Dr. Arnold relates a very striking case of incipient insanity, where the effects were something similar—not that I think you are insane," he interrupted himself, with a smile, as he saw Pennon flush to the brow; "a very interesting case, in bod, which I am minded to tell you.

"A gentleman, a ged thirty-five, active, and in good health, living near London healt for five weeks complained of a slight healthle. He was rather feverish and neglected his avocations and his family. He had been cupped and had taken some medicine, when he received a visit from Dr. Arnold, by whose a lyice he was placed in an asylum, where he passed two years; his delirious fancies lessened by degrees until he was restored to his family, in same mind. His story is thus told by himself:—

"One afternoon in the month of May, feeling a little unwell and in lisposed for business, I determined to take a walk in the city to divert myself. Having reached St. Paul's Churchyard, I stopped at the print shop of Carrington to bok at some en maxines of the cathedral. I had been there but a short time, when an old gentleman, stout, seriously looking, and dressel in brown, also stopped to examine them. Our eves by claimer meeting, he commenced a conversation, admired the view from St. Paul's, related several anecdotes of architect, Sir Christopher Wren, and asked if ever I had been in the dome. On my replying in the negative, and finding that I had not dined, he proposed to repair to a neighboring tavera, and said, that after the repast he would accompany me to St. Paul's; the day, he added, was magnificent for the view, and, as he was familiar with the places, he would I int out all the objects of interest.

"After a histy dinner we mounted to the ball, which is I'll immediately under the cross, and we entered it alone. We had been there some minutes admiring the superb panoruma before us, when the old gentleman drew from the side pocket of his coat an instrument that resemble la compassi and on which some curious flavores were engraved; he murmured some unintelligible words, and placed it in the center of the ball.

ror, which greatly increased on his offer to show me, if I wished, a distant friend, and, also, what he was at that moment doing. My father had long been ill, and I had not been to see him for some weeks; the sudden wish to see him overcame all my scruples. No sooner had I formed this wish than I saw my father in a mirror; he was reclining in a chair taking his usual nap. As I had somewhat doubted the power of the old gentleman, I was frozen with terror, and, feeling very ill, begged him instantly to descend. He complied: and on parting with him he said: "Remember you are the slave of the man of the mirror." I returned home at night, unhappy, restless, and fearful, and full of thoughts of the stranger. For three months I have never ceased to feel his power."

. "Dr. Arnol lasked the patient in what manner the old man exercised the influence over him. Throwing a suspicious glance on the doctor, he took him by the arm, led him through two or three rooms, and at length into the garden, when he exclaimed:—'It is useless; nothing can hide us from him; every place is open to him; he sees and hears us now.'

"I requested him, said the doctor, to show me the mysterious individual who saw and heard us. He replied, with much a gitation:—' Have I not told you that he lives in the ball under the cross of St. Peter's—that he only comes down in the churchyard, and to go and dine in the dark alley? Since that fatal meeting with the necromancer—for I can not call him by any other name—he constantly attracts me within his mirror, sees me thus at all hours of the day, and reads my most secret thoughts. I have the terrible consciou-ness that no act of my life escapes his knowledge, and that there is no spot in which I can be hidden from him."

To the doctor's observation that the darkness of night ought to protect him against the machinations, he replied: I know what you would say, but you are wrong. I have only spoken to you of the mirror, but in a corner of the building the magician showed me a great clock, and I distinctly heard the sounds that came from it, and those that enternly it was a confised melley of laughter, cries of annual of day dry and as I list ned in great terror, he said: "It is my or an of hearing. This great work has communicated a with all the clocks that are in the hieroglyphic circle. By this means I hear the words of all those under my super-vision."

s read s by mans of his reglyphics on the walls and houses, and has read his relations of the walls and houses, and has read his relatified over those whom he has inclosed in his circle of his reglyphics, and who are the objects of his constant hatred.'

he could interpret them.

". The y are," was the reply, "the signs and symbols that you, in your ign stance of their real meaning, have read thus:

You are in error. These sixes are the cabalistic characters that he trucks to intimate the limits of his empire and to prevent the error of his captives. What fitigues I have undergons to with leave myself from his terrible influence! I once walted three days and three nights, until I fell, exhausted and health as, ar inst a wall and slept. On waking I saw the final have as, and that I was completely in his power."

"Was not that quite equal to your wonderful Loat-ride?"

quality dector as he finished. "M. Calmeil reports the case of a verman who alt himself every night nailed in a case of a verman who alt himself every night nailed in a case of a verman who alt himself every night nailed in a case of a verman who alt himself every night nailed in a case of a verman who although the same and case of the character. The same invisible persons in the character of the character. The same invisible persons has the character of the him on his bed." M. Thisphile Guelle lightly interesting story of the effects of hasheesh on himself:

or object in the major is a significant the orders; in the first to the major the major that the others; in the start of the first to the wall, taked to himself, all it is the first the first that the others. I filt perfectly calm until dinner training his citary that the pupils of the eyes of my other friend was over, withough the pupils of the eyes of my other friend began to sparkle strangely and acquire a most singular, torquoise-blue tint. The table being cleared, I (still having my senses) arranged myself comfortably with cushions on a divan to await the cestasy. In a few minutes a general leth-argy overcame me. My body appeared to dissolve and become transparent. I saw the hasheesh, which I had caten, distinctly within me, in the form of an emerald, from which thousand of little sparks were emitted; my-cyclashes length-ened indefinitely, twisting themselves like golden threads round little ivory wheels, which whirled about with inconecivable rapidity. Around me were figures and scrolls of all colors, arabesques, and flowery forms in endless variety, which I can only liken to the variations of a kaleidoscope.'

"I do not see," continued the doctor, "why poison might not produce such, and various other effects."

"All of this reminds me," said Pennon, when the dector had finished his narrative, "of an incident which occurred to myself, in connection with this very necklace. But as it was before I had been inoculated with its poison, and when I was in an exceedingly vigorous frame of body and mind, I can not account for it upon any of the theories which you have advanced to-day."

"Relate it—relate it, please," said the doctor, giving his chair a twitch, and looking interested and excited. He was investigating one of his favorite branches of study, and any thing which gave him a harder nut to crack than usual, was valuable to him. He had been profoundly pleased and interested by the case of his young patient, and was all curiosity to learn as much of him as possible.

"You must be told," began Pennon, "that I commenced my acquaintance with the lady I have been speaking of, at the very hour and moment when she drew these emerals from the well where her mother had east them eighteen years before. I was traveling through the rural districts, on a sketching tour, when I paused before her home, attracted by the quaintness of the house and the beauty of its surroundings. I assisted the young hady to carry in the bucket of water which had been the means of her finding the emeralls; and was hospitably treated by the horsehold into which I had intruded myself. The mother had expressed sorrow and terror at the sight of the necklace, but the daughter had lughe i at her 'superstition,' as we both decanel it, and wowel her jurpose of wearing the jewels whenever she chen. That night I was given a well-farmished but oldthis delenator, where Livis pet and curtained bed was as imper and not the pat. Every, thing to me was charming cal navel. I went to bed by mountight, and fell into the fire File dan'r dreaming, very probably, of the lovely face of by bow a quaintable, but totally forgetful of any magic conand with the necklice, and indeed, oblivious of the neck-Lee its M. As we can feel a person in the darkness, who at pure les u., before they are near enough to touch us; or as we gen our cyclic's when regarded steadily, while sleeping, so was I roused from my slumber, and made conscious of a present in my apertment. The moon was shining with pecultur brighters, and I saw distinctly, standing in the center of the rolling an old lady, dressed in the cestame of fixty or cirly years are, park, powder, gerel skin, short bodies. I I hel at her calmly and without four; my heart scarcely but a thrill burder or faster. Presently she began to speak, is a high, transless key, that vibrated through the chamber with a peace which might have rendered it availble in other r has I can not now recall her precise works, but I remember well their meaning. She asked me why I had mingle b By disting with that of the Percys-spoke of my fate as being L.W irr : l'y l' n' with theirs, and ci the misfortunes sure In all the finding, we gring, or ownership of the necklace - related all and wery weird and majestic way that the time she had invoked was immutable. Then she glided and the man-I could even hear the falling of the doorhalf her her. Now, I just it to your conscience, doctor, if this continue that I was [:: ''y we'l, he from form, mi, dumme, or excitement of any hist, In a string r in the house. There was no old bely an important the house; and if there but been she weall not la ball in that if hand melent cotune. I call didirent in the figures in the pattern of her brook led sitt."

"Well I have," collect the deter; "you're sure Firm not be any thing of the kind-month diserler, I man. Year himsterna, patientemperante are frequently overstrung."

"But I have been remarkably free from nervous diseases—you see what a physique I have!" and Pennon threw back his shoulder and expanded his broad chest.

"I must 'make a note of it'-perhaps I can explain it by the time I see you again," said the physician, taking out pencil and note-book.

CHAPTER XIII.

A LETTER AND ITS CONSEQUENCES.

Of fair May, in May Fair, there can be no reason Why, when calmly absorbing your dry toast and butter. Your nerves should be suddenly thrown in a flutter, At the sight of a neat little letter, address'd In a woman's handwriting, containing, half-guess'd, An odor of violets, faint as the spring, And coquettishly seal'd with a small signet-ring.

But in autumn, the season for somber reflection, When a damp day, at breakfast, begins with dejection, The whole case, believe me, is totally changed And a letter may alter the plans we arranged Over night."

Owen Meredita.

The morning following upon his interview with the doctor, the chore-boy brought Pennon a letter, who was expecting no message, because he had not left his address with any of his friends. He recognized the dainty chirography with some surprise, some vexation, and that ineffable complacent feeling which diffuses itself through the consciousness of men when they suppose a beautiful woman is making an alvance to them.

"I thought Rosalie was cured of her folly," was the flattering comment, made entirely to himself, with which he broke the seal.

The letter gave him a different opinion of Miss Rosalie Sloane from that which he entertained when he commenced its perusal. It ran thus:

"FRIEND PAUL:—It has always been a mystery to me, why sensible men like to make fools of themselves. You have disappointed me terribly. The morning of your selfish and ungulant flight, I had as sweet a confession to bear to you, as your fondest dream could anticipate. Think not that Rosalie Shane was about to throw herself at your feet. If she ever had a weakness like that, she has recovered from it, and is none the worse for it.

"But I had shared the room of an innocent babe, pure and un leiled, 'unskilled in all the arts that worldlings prize,' and I wen her gentle confidence. She told me, with such shy blushes, the reason why she had once refused the hand of the man she leved lest in the world—that it was because she thought an infirmity, which unfitted her to be the wife of so I roud end sensitive a person, was fixed hopelessly upon hermand now that infirmity was removed, she hesitated to manifest a retraction of her refusal, lest, in the mean time, he had grown in this rent to her—theid thing! I made her happy by assuring her that man still leved her—her only upon earth; that his passion, instead of being exterminated, was like channemile, and throve the more, the more it was trampled up a. Having convinced her of this sweet truth (as I deemed it) I took an asthetic pleasure in her emotions.

""She wept with pity and delight,
She blush'd with love and virgin shame,
And, like the murmur of a dream,
I heard her breathe (thy) name.

"'She half-inclosed me with her arms,
She press'd me with a meek embrace,
And bending back her head look'd up
And smiled into my face.'

ever had I by awake nearly all night, thinking of the pretty and delight way in which I should appreach the morose lover with the glad tidings.

When in raing came. I found be had taken to ignominious think. I was so bitterly provoked and disappointed, that I firmly resolved never to break the net-work of error in which he had purpedly involved himself.

"But the sight of a wan, sad face, a pair of pitiful eyes, which the I to smile their loving farewell at me when the cambes moved off for the cars, with a certain party among its possess, moved me to brook my iron resolution.

"Noyse thought you were in New York, but I knew better. I have read your selfish nature, and I know you are rusticating this moment, enjoying all the splen for and beauty of your costle in solitude, not only unminitud of friends, but of a heart that is breaking itself most usele sly. Well! if somelody dies, I know what her epitaph ought to be; but I blieve sleed its too much good sense to die for so inadequate a cause. However, she is not of the strongest make—she is fine clay, easily shattered. We are going home soon. I shall not say whether we are well and happy, or not, for you do not care, and do not deserve to know. The Percys are at home by this time.

Yours, in high dudgeon,
"Rosalie Sloane."

A word to the wise is sufficient—sometimes.

Five days after the receipt of the communication which set Pennon to packing his trunk so unexpectedly, and which caused the poor housekeeper to say to the chore-log: "It's plain to be seen, we'll have little peace of our lives with a master that never knows his own mind, and is here on the yand away another and buck the next"—five days after this, about half an hour before sunset to be explicit. Clematis Perey, looking fragile and wan, leaned back in the arm-chair her mother had drawn to the window for her, and looked out upon the landscape. It was the window at which their guest had painted the picture now language over the mantel—the scene was one she had always loved, and she gued at it now more than ever; for she was an invalid, and had not much else to do.

Her parents claned in at her from the diningerous, where

"It's the charable neckbor which has done it all," said the mother.

"Fill Westick, wife! it's that confounded painter of pictures!

It was seldom Mr. Percy used strong language; but his feelings were by no means enviole as he saw the "sile daughter of his house and heart" dropper delly before his eyes.

It was well that the bely of the house had eat the table a nertly, and plead on it "need at a reafful that's min"—to even as the fither spoke so gruffly the latch of the gate clicked, and Clematis started from her musings, to hear a voice at the door, and "fortsteps in the passage," which sent the blood rushing to her wan face.

Even before the tea was served Pennon had told his story strightly, and asked the parents for the hand of their darling.

"It will is hard perting them our only one," murmured the father.

"By it will be best for her—can you not see it will, husbut let and the mother, like all mothers self-abnegating, lookel at the right light in her daughter's eyes, and forgot her own threatened loneliness.

"I will give you a pertrait so like her that you will scarcely know the difference," and the young man laughed in the exceeding lightness of his heart. "I have some curious things to tell you about that portrait—and about your necklace, too. Not now, for the tea is waiting."

That evening, he told to an interested trio of listeners, of the seret cause of the fatality of the necklace, of the wound he had received, and of its singular consequences. He product the emeral is, and showed to them the steel claw whose fungs had been death to the fair and young, years and centuries ago.

"Let me take these gens to the city with me, and have a new setting made in them. They will then be as harmless as the most provide of precious stones. They are too beautiful to lie imprisoned in darkness forever."

"Hips take really convinced, Mr. Pennon, that the emeralds the less are safely to be worn, I will give them to Clematis as part of her trousseau."

"Dealt I bush, Chematis, at that word," whi pered her lover.
"The track is, we are already married, according to the vision.
It will not seem so very strange when I really call you wife."

I so it never ret," said Mrs. Percy, "until I see that "Whire jet east, he fire in the grate for the purpose," said Clematis.

"Nay," replied Pennon, "they must remain as it is, until our untiling-day. We will celebrate that happy time by extrising flower the evil genius of the necklade"

CHAPTER XIV.

A BRIEF RECORD.

"It was with doubt and trembling
I whisper'd in her ear:
Oh, take her answer, bonny bird,
That all the world may hear!

"Sing it, sing it, silver-throat,
Upon the wayside tree,
How fair she is, how true she is,
And how she loveth me!" Aldrich.

Rosalie Sloane is at home. Not many people have returned to the city yet from their summer resorts; but the beautiful belle is preparing for her wedding, and is glad to have her time so much to herself. She keeps two dress-makers and three or four embroiderers and sewing-girls engage I, and is very happy amid laces, and silks, and robes, and new patterns, and the beautiful presents which come to her almost every day from some of her many friends. She is very happy, and far lovelier than ever. It can not be the excitement of the new things and the anticipation of the coming gay season, during which she will reign as a bride alone, which keeps her eye so moist and bright and her cheek charming with its changing tints.

Pennon, too, has grown radiant; stays in the city, and goes to visit her very often.

"What happiness do I not owe to you?" he memurs almost every day, as he presses her delicate hand; and she smiles an answer out of her dark-blue eyes.

In the mean time, what has become of Noyse? He, too, is in the city. He has gone to practising law with his uncle. He studies night and day, almost, and works with a will and purpose to succeed. He seems trying to banish some constant, preying thought. He would be restless, uneasy, first-ful, about, if he did not campel bluecht to this industry

Then, also, he has determined to be a rich man, if perseverance and talent can make him one. Perhaps in this he hopes for some future revenge.

Pennon has had a confidential interview with Mrs. Butterly, in which he has informed her that he shall want her best front parlor and bedroom after the eighteenth of October, and that he will furnish them himself, at which she is delighted and promises to keep his secret.

Mrs. Fencion is in her element. If there has been a care upon her mind since her own husband was secured, it has been that her darling sister was yet unprovided for. She has held up her pretty hands many times in horror at the carelessness with which Rosalie dismissed her suitors. But now there is really a wedling on hand. She can pore over the report of bridal fashions and costumes, of coiffures, gloves, bonnets, etc., to her heart's content. It is the only kind of literature which she really loves, and her discussions upon the subjects treated of, prove her a critic and woman of unimpeachable taste. She can go out shopping every day and not be called extravagant by her loving and indulgent husband, for is she not shopping for the bride?

Rosalie is not exempt from a passion for these things, likewise; but a deeper passion, a pure emotion has been awakenel in her nature, never to sleep again, and as she dreams glowing dreams of the future, and her heart swells with a new, strange happiness, she is not sorry to allow her sister to assume the responsibility of the trousseau.

CHAPTER XV.

EXPECTATION.

"Wreathe we a wedding chaplet."

And we talk'd, oh, how we talk'd! her voice so cadence! in the talking,

With the leafy sound of woodlands, humming round where we were walking.

MRS. BROWNING.

"So many sweet secrets to breathe to each other."

Ir was one of the most gorgeous of autumn days, about a week before the eighteenth of October, that a carriage passed before the little avenue leading up to the stone cottage, and a lady with an incredible amount of baggage was landed from it.

"What a sweet, rustic, delicious place," murmure l Miss Sloane, for it was she. "Pennon said truly that it was a secluded Eden—and it holds an Eye that never sinned."

"'O fairest of the rural maids!" as Bryant says, I seek you in the midst of belitting beauty," she cried, as Clematis came hastening down the path to meet her.

Both the girls laughed and bluched as they kissed each other, as if they had been lovers.

- "You promised to be my bridemaid, and it seems that I am to be yours," said Clematis.
 - "And I am so happy—are not you, dearest?"
 - "Oh, very! but it seems so strange!-I can not realize it."
 - " Nor I, either. I hardly dare think of it."
- "Who would have dreamed it, the first time we saw each other?"
 - "Ah, who would?"
- "Come in and see mother. I will send Peter to bring in the baggage, and then we will have lunch; and then we can talk over what we have to do, while you lie down and rest."
- "Oh, I'm neither tired nor hungry. After I have spoken with your beloved manna, I should love to walk through the in a low and sit under that flaming maple-tree that I see glow-ling like the burning bush between us and the hills,"

"You are as remantic as I am," burghed Clematis. "I did not think it."

"In held I red, when I was a child, to be a real sentimental." But it spoils one so to devote themselves to society. I am a time hack my old testes though. I would give my lest dress or my diamond ring to be the fresh, enthusiastic creature that you are."

"Do you feel so weld, Resdie? Let me see, you are twenty, or thereabouts, are you not?"

"It was not the probe, it was the manner of life which I was not thus. One could stay young forever in a place like this. That rustly well-sweep Loks as if it dipped into the fountain of a special youth. By the way, Pennon wrote some verses about that, did he not?"

A alu the silvery lunch of the flir girls rung on the air.

"There is meaning writing for us at the deer."

They have not their being steps toward the house.

"Welcome, my dear Miss Sloane."

As Mr. Percy kissed the young traveler's check, speaking in let soft voice, and boking more welcomes than she said, as the untied the bonnet-strings and removed the cape, Rosalic wished that she had such a mother.

"I have not help a mether since I was a little child. Mrs. Percy," since il, "which is the reason I have so many faults, I capet. Well you not a lopt me, and try and better me?"

"I will all pt you and take suitable care of you until some

"All, well; that will be soon enough," and the beautiful ill the hard Clanatis caught its echo and sighed too. Then excling the look in each other's eyes they smiled at themselves.

The tray of refreshments which were brought into the parler looked so nice that Miss Sloane found she was a triffed hungry, after all; so she ate a little lunch, talked a little longer with her hosters, took up her bonnet and—

" Now for the maple-tree, Clematis."

With arms about each other's waists they wandered forth; and there was no correy citiz noof the world to sneer at their unaffected friendship. Mrs. Percy looked after them lovingly and admiringly, brushing a tear from her lids and seeming sad for an instant as she turned away.

"Willis says, 'Give me a seat on a sofa,' but if this is not more luxurious than velvet and steel springs, then I have no perception of luxury," said Rosalie, as she flung herself on to the fine crisp grass and golden moss beneath the maple.

"And what a canopy we have—better than the crimson silk which used to flaunt over kings and queens."

"More splendid than the embroideries of the old English courts," responded the city belle, as she leaned against the knarled trunk and looked up into the fluttering, sighing depth of rainbow foliage above her.

"How gently it whispers to us. The tree loves you, Rosalie, for it has dropped one, two, three of its brightest leaves into your hair, as if to crown you. You told me in your last letter, I believe, that your dress was of white moire antique, and that you had ordered mine to be just like yours. Of course you have an elegant vail, and dainty orange flowers and camelias, fashioned by the fingers of some little French girl. Now I propose that we weave us wreaths of these brilliant leaves, and crown ourselves with these instead."

"What would sister Bertha say to that?" and Rosalie laughed at the picture her fancy drew of Mrs. Fencion's consternation to find her care and exquisite coiffure exchanged for such a barbarous garland.

"They are not appropriate to a wedding, since it is the touch of death that gives them their glow; but if it was not for that I should certainly choose them," continued Clematis. "However, I have two or three white roses in full blocm now, and we shall not lack for the pure, real flowers."

"Have you no gardens or conservatories near? Bertha will be in despair."

"No, but I have some beautiful plants in my little study. There is a japonica budded, besides the roses, and geraniums in abundance. We shall have flowers."

"I am so glad that I am going to be married here; I shall escape the formalities of a town wedding. I shall realize my new hopes and my new happiness more."

" How wonderful it all is!" murmured her companion.

They grew silent, each absorbed in their own musings, until the tinkle of a distant bell called them to tea.

In the evening Clematis took her visitor through all the rooms of the house which were to be open to company. The arrangements were simple and tasteful, in character with the size of the mansion and the fashions of its people.

"This will be your room after you are mar-"

" Hush !"

"Why, Rosa, I could not help mentioning it, could I? Is it not a queer, quaint old chamber? Here is where Pennon slept the first night he came to our house. This week you will room with me; but let us sit here a moment by the window—the night is so lovely."

"It is indeed a quaint room; very suggestive of ghosts and old legends."

Clematis laughed merrily.

"Your speaking of ghosts reminds me that Pennon saw one that first night he staid in it."

"How do you know?"

"Oh, he told me. Besides, I knew it before."

"What kind of a ghost was it-young and pretty?"

"No, old and wrinkled. You have heard us speak of my emeral In cklace, and all the strange stories attached to it. Pennen has told you how he found me at the well just as I hand the necklace in it. The dismay which mother showed when I came in with it, set me to thinking of all the stories she but from time to time excited my fancy with; and you may be sure that when I went to my room that night I did not go to bed without first pondering long over the precious eneralls. I was very glad I had found it; it was quite too is actiful to hid; its "purest ray screne in the dark, unfathomed caves" of an all well; and as I was not the least bit credulous I smiled at the legends which my dear mother was went to connect with it. It put an idea into my head, which I was just mischievous enough (I was full of the spirit of mischief then)—"

"And have changed a great deal in four months, I suppose."

"Just wild enough to carry into effect. I do not know now how I dured to do it. I have no intention of confessing to Pennon unless he questions me about it. In the bureau of my room there is a drawer fall of my grandmother's old-fashioned finery—her wedding suit, I believe."

"That's fine. You will show them to me,"

"I got out the dress, the belt, the emeral I clasp, the puffed hair, the high-heeled shoes, and put them on; drew a few wrinkles in my face with a bit of India ink, and practised my voice awhile at a high and querelous, but not loud pitch, I think I should have passed for the spirit of my ancestor—at least, that was what I intended."

"Did you really venture into the young gentleman's room?"

"I did. It was very audacious for me. But I peoped through the key-hole and saw that his light was extinguished; and I could hear by his regular breathing that he was asleep. I knew that if he were frightened, or attempted to rise, that one bound would take me out of the chamber, and that I could escape to my room before he detected me. Stealing softly in I began the speech which I had studied—I forget the words now—but they connected him with the family destiny and the emerald necklace."

"Very easy to prophery, and then set deliberately to work to bring about what you have forctold," jeered Rosalie.

"Oh, but in sober truth I had not a serious thought of such a thing. I supposed the young gentleman would leave us and our fortunes up in the morrow, never to think of us again."

"Wished that he would, too, I make no doubt! How did he take the intrusion of so wonderful an apparition?"

"Very coolly. Quite too deliberately to please me. He was neither fright ned nor exasperated, but looked at me so calculy through the moonlight that it was I who grew alorn dar fear that he recognized me, and was laurding silently at my expense."

"He did not recognize you. He has told me alout the ghost," as he called it, and confered that it has puzzled him in thinking about it. He never thought of you."

"Because he could not think I would do such a thin a. Oh, I never mean to tell him, unless he asks."

"You see how dangerous it is to prophecy even in sport," sail Rosalie with mock gravity; "for your ille jest came true in some very serious ways."

- " I can never regret it," marmared the young girl.
- "What if that lightning had killed you?"
- "But it did not; and if ever there was any evil in the emeral is I have it is now exorcised. I have had my share of the ills they bequeath. What a singular accidant that Pennon should have found them when I lost them on the island!"

"And what a panger pain it gave me when I saw him walking about the garden holding them in his hand."

"Dilly use him doing that, dear Rosalie? But why did it give you pain?"

Note nind now, darling, since it is all over, now and inver. I had not been behaving well then, you see. I was tolk and vain, and wanted to conquer every one—even the unconquerable Pennon."

"Uncen probable," mused Clematis, "yet so easily, easily conquered."

"Net o very early, my dan little a great many girls ci mind, hart, and person, to vanqui hahim at last."

"Is it not stronge," spoke Clematis, after a moment's silence, "that the only two offers I ever had should both occur upon the day that I was most stricken? Shall I take it as a proof of the power and unself-shows of true love?"

Year fir the lave men have fir doing all the talking the law. No don't both of them thought a quiet wife would be a great blessing."

Why, Realie, what a girl! I should not wonder, though, if that last supposition was true of one of them. Poor Julien! I must smile when I think of his charrin and ill-temper. He went off that sme afternoon, first twitting metof being in love with a 1 was benturer. In case he had an eye upon my very in last little forme, but I am not sure."

If the worse to find prieved over all the lovers she diseards, sing in the last a melancady librar in," said the proudent and all relation Proudents and all relations of the Route shock back her golden hair.

It was your late that hight whom the girls sank to sleep, for the troits had been carried up-stairs, and there was the whole he had at and discussed.

After their late had been computed, it was surprising that they slumbered at all.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE NECKLACE IS EXORCISED.
"Witches! Avaunt!"

THERE were two weddings upon the eighteenth of October; and if there were, in any Eden of the world, a happier bride-groom than Paul Pennon, that other happier one was Noyse.

The pride and tenderness which dwelt in Rosalie's eyes as she looked at him with a new and sweet timidity—the thought of that superb beauty having yielded to him her heart at last, was joy enough to blot out all memory of the bitter cup he had once tasted, except just enough to flavor more exquisitely the present draught of contentment.

The ceremonies took place on a golden afternoon and the festivities were continued late into the evening. Music, dancing, and feasting honored the occasion. Julien Percy was one of the guests, though not a very brilliant one.

Clematis was alone in her chamber. There was still a "sound of revelry" in the parlor; some one was playing the piano, and conversation was going merrily on. She heard all this indistinctly as she stood in her bridal chamber. Two or three of the ladies had stolen away with her to offer their services, but she had dismissed them and was serving herself. The bridal vail was removed from her hair, the thowers from her bosom, and now she stood motionless, her head drooped, her hands listless, while a crowd of emotions and memories rushed over her. Saddenly she became conscious of a strange presence; the light flared and flickered, and a dim, ghostly luster, neither that of moon or star, filled the chamber. She felt irresistibly impelled to turn and gaze upon the spirit which she felt was near her, yet her body refused to obey.

"Clematis Percy Pennon, heires of our line and inheritress of our misfortunes, dillst thou hope to escape the destiny irrevocably fixed upon every bride who, as heires of her father's house, has worn the Emerald Necklace?" asked a thin and dreary voice, yet sweet and sat withal, whose solemn accents, low as they were, filled every nook with painful distinctness. Look upon those whose successor thou art?"

Half paralyzed as she was with terror, Clematis made a mighty effort to burst the fear that was binding her, and confronted the speaker. Not one, but four misty white phantoms hovered midway between her and the door of the chamber.

"That is indeed the fatal number," she whispered, as the chill of dread crept around her heart.

"Ay! and thou shalt make the fifth. Would'st know thy fate in time to prepare thyself for it?"

"Any fate that does not part me from the one I love!" she cried in sudden anguish, as the thought of the probability of a separation from her husband smote her heart.

"Thy fate, then, is-" began the melancholy voice-

"To be the most worshiped, the most adored of women!"

interrupted the clear, soft voice of Pennon at the door.

"Mercy!" shrieked the spirits, flitting in every direction; and the sound of mocking laughter and merry jibes sent the blood glowing through the bosom that had been so chilled.

After a wedding is there ever any thing more to be told? Not if one would end a story with an artistic climax. Very uneffective it is to come fluttering in with the small banners and tag end of the procession, after the grand ceremony is over, the great act of the spectacle performed. Yet we had curiosity enough to keep our eyes for awhile upon the newmarried couples. We wished to know whether the earnest resolves to live more for others than herself, to be content with a man not magnificently rich, to find her purest happiness in the love which she felt herself capable of entertaining for her husband, lasted any length of time with the beautiful belle, once the veriest butterfly of fashion.

We are happy to announce that "practice makes perfect" —that the charms of her soul and mind are equal to her person and manner—that she grows more truly lovable day by day—that the last thing the proud and contented Noyse thinks of is to regret the time when he pardoned the fair belle for her transient falsity to him.

Pennon is more of an artist, poet, and enthusiast than ever, for the presence of Clematis is like an inspiration to him. He almost thinks it is she who paints pictures and writes rhymes, so does she sympathize with his tastes and give life to his dreams.

When the wedding-party went from the stone cottage, the second day of their marriage, they concluded to pay a flying visit to the castle, as Pennon was anxious to show its beauty to Clematis, and they thought the scenery must be very lovely at that season of the year.

Rosalie, for a moment, was loth to return to the scene of her ill conduct, but she overcame the feeling bravely, and became secretly anxious to test the strength of her purposes by recalling the temptations of that luxurious home.

They found the castle a most charming place to dream away the honeymoon; and there they lingered until the cold winds of November warned them home. They visited the island and held another pic-nic there, and enjoyed every delightful day wandering about the grounds.

"Do you regret the necessity of parting with this place?"

asked Pennon of his bride one day.

"I should be glad if you were able to keep it, as it was a bequest. I do not regret its splendor so much. The old stone cottage in the little valley will always be a sweet place for us to spend our summers in, don't you think so?"

"Ay, very sweet to me, dear Clematis; for it was there that I found you, my pearl, my star, my wildwood flower."

"What a habit you have of calling me names," laughed the happy young wife.

Pennon, when he left upon his artistic excursion, had promised Mrs. Butterby a story when he should return in November. He had not the smallest idea how that story would terminate—that it would wind up in stereotyped fashion with a wedding—but it ended even so, and this that has been told you is the identical tale that he related to her one evening about the first of December, illustrating some of its most striking passages with the loving picture of his beautiful bride, who nestled by his side while he narrated it.

"Dear suz!" remarked that good woman, "I never thought none of my boarders would have a true story happen to 'em."

A New and Popular Series!

BEADLE'S

DIME BIOGRAPHICAL LIBRARY

MONTHLY ISSUES, TO COMPRISE

Original, Unique, and Authentic Biographies,

OF THE MOST CELEBRATED CHARACTERS OF MODERN TIMES, PREPARED WITH GREAT CARE, BY SOME OF OUR BEST KNOWN AND ABLEST WRITERS, AND ESPECIALLY DESIGNED FOR THE HANDS AND HOMES OF THE AMERICAN PROPLE.

READY THURSDAY, DECEMBER 20th.

GARIBALDI: The Hero of Italy.

BY O. J. VICTOR.

The wonderful career of Garribaldi reads like a wild romance. No man ever lived who has performed such prodigies of valor, or who has had a more varied fortune. Mr. Victor has had access to the most authentic sources of information, and, it is but proper to say, has produced

The Only Authentic Life!

Of the man yet given. It is written in a style calculated to enchain attention from first to last; and will prove unquestionably, one of the most interesting, instructive and delightful books yet offered to the patrons of the DIME PUBLICATIONS.

TO BE FOLLOWED, JANUARY 22D, BY

JOHN PAUL JONES:

THE REVOLUTIONARY NAVAL HERO.

BEADLE AND COMPANY, Publishers, 141 Filliam Street, New York.

BEADLE'S DINE BOOKS!

FOR THE MILLION!

BEADLE'S DIME SCHOOL MELODIST, BEADLE'S DIME LETTER-WRITER. BEADLE'S DIME COOK-BOOK. BEADLE'S DIME REGIPE-BOOK. BEADLE'S DIME DIALOGUES NO. 1, BEADLE'S CIME DIALDGUES NO. 2, BEADLE S DIME SPEAKER NO. 1, BEADLE'S DIME SPEAKER NO. 2,

BEADLE'S DIME BOOK OF ETIQUETTE, BEADLE'S DIME DRESS-MAKER, BEADLE'S DIME MELODIST. BEADLE'S DIME BOOK OF DREAMS, BEADLE'S DIME CHESS INSTRUCTOR, BEADLE'S DIME BOOK OF CRICKET, BEADLE'S DIME BASE-BALL PLAYER. BEADLE'S DIME GUIDE TO SWIMMING

Beadle's Dime Sant Book No. 1, | Beadle's Dime Some Book No. 2, Beadle's Dime Song Book No. 3, I

Bendle's Dime Song Book No. 4, Bendle's Dime Song Book No. 5. Bendle's Dime Song Book No. 6, BEADLE'S DIME SONG BOOK NO. 7.

BEADLE'S DIME BOOK OF FUN No. 1. BEADLE'S DIME BOOK OF FUN NO. S

BEADLE'S DIME NOVELS.

A Dollaur Book for a Dime!

Each volume contains One Hundred and Twenty-Eight large 12mo. pages of letter-press, printed with clear and expressly-prepared type and bookpaper, and bound in heavy paper covers of bright salmon color-making a volume of much beauty, and delightful to read. The volumes will be issued semi-monthly, in regular succession.

Dime Novels Now Ready:

NO. 1. - MALAESKA: THE INDIAN WIFE OF THE WHITE HUNTER.

NO. 2.—THE PRIVATEER'S CRUISE, AND THE BRIDE OF POMPRET HALL

No. 3. -MYRA: THE CHILD OF ADOPTION.

No. 4.—ALICE WILDE: THE RAFTSMAN'S DAUGHTER. No. 5.—THE GOLDEN BELT; OR, THE CARID'S PLEDGE.

No. 6. -CHIP: THE CAVE CHILD.

No. 7.—THE REEFER OF '761; OR, THE CRUISE OF THE FIRE-FLY.

No. 8.—SETH JONES OF NEW HAMPSHIRE; OR, THE CAPTIVES OF THE FRONTIER.

No. 9 .- THE SLAVE SCULPTC'R; OR, THE PROPHETESS OF THE SECRET CHAMBERS.

NO. 10 .- THE BACKWOODS' BRIDE: A ROMANCE OF SQUATTER LIFE. VINTRESSE; OR, THE FORTUNES OF A No. 11.-THE PRISONER OF LA-CUBAN HEIRESS.